This One Key Will Finally Bring You Spiritual Breakthrough

Labubu is the latest collectible doll craze sweeping the globe, especially on social media platforms like TikTok. But alongside the excitement, some have raised concerns — is this harmless plush monster actually connected to demonic forces?

What Is Labubu?
As Allie Beth Stuckey explains, Labubu is a "plush monster doll character" inspired by a Hong Kong author and artist Kasing Lung's fantasy trilogy "The Monsters." Stuckey describes Labubu as a "mischievous but kind-hearted elf" who causes playful chaos but ultimately has "good intentions." The dolls became a viral sensation, helped along by celebrities like Dua Lipa and Rihanna, and have grown into a massive collectible trend with PopMart, the Chinese company behind them, raking in hundreds of millions of dollars.

According to Stuckey, "Labubu has become this global collectible craze, with people so obsessed they attend Labubu fashion shows, raves and even Labubu pride events." But she also notes, "these are adults, not kids — which says something about the cultural moment we're in."

The Demonic Allegations
Some critics online have linked Labubu to the ancient Mesopotamian demon Pazuzu due to "similar facial features such as the big eyes and mischievous grin." Pazuzu was known as a "king of demons of the wind," who could bring plagues or protection depending on how people invoked him. Stuckey points out that “while Pazuzu was considered evil, people still kept charms of him for protection — and Labubu, despite being innocent, is also a troublemaker in the stories.”

There are even viral TikToks claiming the doll’s eye color changes or that its smile grows larger, with some users attributing personal misfortunes to owning Labubu. One user “burned her Labubu, calling it cursed,” while another “threw the doll away after a near-death experience.” Yet Stuckey questions these stories: “Are these real spiritual encounters or just content designed for views? I don’t know.”

What Does the Bible Say?
Stuckey turns to Scripture for clarity. Citing 1 Corinthians 8:4-6, she says, “Paul makes it clear that idols and objects themselves have no power. ‘An idol is nothing at all in the world,’ and only God has real authority.”

Stuckey warns against superstition, and encourages believers to focus on “worshiping the Creator rather than the creature,” and to “discern cultural influences while standing firm in God’s authority.”

What Should Parents and Christians Do?
While Labubu itself is “not inherently demonic,” Stuckey stresses the importance of cultural discernment. “The obsession with these dolls reflects larger cultural issues — perpetual adolescence, misplaced attachments and social media-fueled addictions.” She advises parents, “It’s your job to set boundaries and teach your kids to avoid these harmful obsessions.”

Above all, Stuckey urges believers to “know the power of God over evil, and not to fear objects but to exercise spiritual authority in Christ.” Rather than fearing toys or symbols, she says, “We should focus on teaching biblical truth and protecting the vulnerable.”

LA Marzulli: What JD Vance’s UFO Interest Means for the Coming Great Deception

New developments surrounding Israel’s red heifer program have stirred discussion among prophecy watchers and those following preparations for the Third Temple.

As Charisma recently reported, the Temple Institute announced that all of the red heifers were disqualified from being used for upcoming sacrifice that many have been awaiting patiently for. Now, Mondo Gonzales of Prophecy Watchers is also sharing his viewpoint on the topic.

“About two weeks ago, Byron had posted a video of a ceremony that took place, which was clearly not on the Mount of Olives. It was in Samaria,” Gonzales explained. The brief video showed a red heifer burning ceremony lasting only a few seconds.

Shortly after, the Temple Institute announced a surprising update: the five red heifers brought to Israel on September 15, 2022, “were no longer qualified.” Gonzales noted, “These cows are almost four years old now… There’s no upper age limit, so a lot of people wonder, did maybe these cows get disqualified because of too many non-red hairs?”

The Temple Institute’s Facebook post also admitted, “They can’t always be fully transparent,” a statement Gonzales said matched his early suspicions about the vulnerability of these animals: “How can you have these red heifers out in Shiloh where they’re accessible to be harmed? That was always a question.”

Despite this disqualification, Byron Stinson released a longer video of a July 1 ceremony in Samaria, which he described as a legitimate ritual: “It was done with a Cohen, a priest, and a very qualified red heifer… It followed all of the biblical commands.” However, Gonzales pointed out, “It just doesn’t follow all of the oral traditions of the rabbinic traditions.” Stinson himself acknowledged, “Will it be accepted by everybody? No… Will there be another one on the Mount of Olives? Probably.”

Looking ahead, Gonzales stressed that the red heifer issue “is not going away.” The four remaining heifers will be “put into the breeding program within Israel” to preserve their valuable genetic material, which is “99% pure.” He added, “The rabbis I don’t believe for one second will allow a non-Mount of Olives ceremony to take place. It’s in the Mishna, which they consider to be oral tradition and authoritative.”

Beyond the red heifers, Gonzales noted a significant shift on the Temple Mount itself: “You had Itamar Ben-Gvir go up on Tisha B’Av to the Temple Mount dancing and singing and praying. That was extremely unusual.” He observed this as part of a “shift of the status quo of the Temple Mount” accelerating over the past six to eight months.

In summary, while the Temple Institute’s announcement about disqualifying the original red heifers may seem like a setback, the broader picture shows ongoing activity and momentum: “The third temple is in movement,” Gonzales affirmed. “These five are going to be put into the breeding program… There were at least a dozen more in the wings.”

For those following the prophetic timetable, the message is clear: the quest for the red heifer—and the preparations for the Third Temple—are far from over.

Dinesh D’Souza: The Truth About the Russia Hoax and Elite Corruption

Weaver noted that right now, the body of Christ is in a season of pruning to be made right with God before His return.

“This is the cutting season,” says Weaver. “And there is strong spiritual circumcision that is happening. Cutting and Lord corrects those He loves. So, if you're not getting corrected, you're not getting loved on."

Weaver believes that this is the time to stop treating long-time Christians as infants, and to start expecting greater spiritual maturity from them.

"We're all committed to come up higher," she says. "You can learn to walk in the Spirit the easy way. You can go willingly. You can submit. You can get your spirit under control. You can get the works of the flesh out. You can get out of that carnal mind. You can come out of delusion, and you can walk in the Spirit the easy way, or He'll teach you the hard way."

In this critical hour, the call to spiritual maturity is louder than ever. God is inviting His people to walk in true authority—aligned with His Word, led by His Spirit and rooted in righteousness.

As the church undergoes a season of pruning and correction, believers must choose obedience over convenience and authenticity over appearance. The path forward demands a deeper surrender, a higher standard and a willingness to be refined for His purposes.

Supernatural Sightings or AI? Eyewitnesses Stunned by Walking Figure in the Sky

In a powerful message by Evangelist Daniel Kolenda through Daystar, he reminded Christians of the importance of living a life desperate for the glory of God the same way that Moses sought the presence of the Lord.

Kolenda pointed to Moses' heartfelt prayer recorded in Scripture: "If Your presence does not go with us, do not bring us up from here" (Ex. 33:15). Moses understood something the modern Church often forgets — that the Promised Land, the blessings, the breakthroughs and the success of ministry mean nothing without the manifest presence of God. The essence of revival and true spiritual power is not programs, music styles, or large crowds, but the undeniable presence of God moving among His people.

Moses also questioned how anyone would recognize God's people as distinct if His presence was not among them. "How will anyone know we are Yours unless Your presence goes with us?" This challenge still echoes today. Kolenda emphasized that what sets believers apart is not outward appearances or methods, but the reality of God's presence flowing through the Church.

Central to this presence is the blood of Jesus, Kolenda explained. The blood is the bridge that allows believers to boldly approach God's throne and experience His power. Kolenda declared, "It's the blood of Jesus that sets people free. It's the blood of Jesus that heals the sick. It's the blood of Jesus that raises the dead. It's the blood of Jesus that drives out devils." This is not merely theology but witnessed reality — the very foundation of every true miracle and conversion.

He challenged the Church to stop relying on flashy techniques, urging believers instead to return to the raw power of the cross. The blood of Jesus remains potent, capable of cleansing, delivering, healing and transforming lives. It is through the blood that the Church can experience the revival Moses longed for and that the world desperately needs.

Kolenda's message serves as a reminder that revival begins in the house of God, and it begins with a desperate cry for His presence — just as Moses prayed centuries ago.

As the Church stands at a crossroads, Kolenda's call is clear: we must refuse to settle for anything less than the full, fiery presence of God. Only then will the Church rise up in power, marked not by programs or personalities, but by the unmistakable glory of God's presence shining like Moses' radiant face.

Entire Muslim Family Experiences Supernatural Dream of Jesus

In countries where Christianity is illegal and Bibles are banned, God is still reaching hearts in miraculous ways—even through dreams.

That’s exactly what happened in southwest Iran, where an entire Muslim family had the same supernatural encounter with Jesus on the same night, forever changing the trajectory of their lives.

The testimony, which was recently shared online by Kap Chatfield, recounts the story of a 17-year-old Iranian boy who became disillusioned with Islamic ritualism and began questioning why he had to pray in Arabic to a God who supposedly understood all languages.
