

Case Involving Plot Against Trump Thrown Out Over Legal Misstep

A West Virginia prosecutor has dropped a criminal case against a woman accused of making a threatening social media post about President Donald Trump, according to a report from Fox News.

Morgan Morrow, 39, had been charged earlier this year with making terroristic threats after authorities alleged she posted a message on TikTok that appeared to suggest harm against the president. However, the case was dismissed without prejudice on April 16, meaning it could be refiled at a later date.

The dismissal was not based on the content of the post itself, but rather on how the investigation was conducted.

The Social Media Post That Sparked the Case

According to Fox News, the case centered on a TikTok message in which Morrow allegedly wrote: “Surely a sniper with a terminal illness can’t be a big ask out of 343 million.”

Investigators interpreted the statement as a potential attempt to solicit an assassination, prompting swift action from law enforcement. The Jackson County Sheriff’s Department said at the time of her arrest that she was accused of recruiting individuals to carry out violence against the president.

Legal Breakdown: Miranda Rights at the Center

The case ultimately unraveled due to a critical procedural issue. Prosecutors acknowledged that Morrow had not been properly advised of her Miranda rights before being questioned by law enforcement.

Because of this, key statements she allegedly made could be deemed inadmissible in court, significantly weakening the case and ultimately leading to it being thrown out.

Because in the end, what we say—and how we say it—matters more than ever.

A Prophetic Shift Into May: John Eckhardt Declares Season of Newness and Divine Favor

Marilyn Hickey, the pioneering global evangelist and Bible teacher, went home to be with the Lord on April 25, 2026, at the age of 94. In a previous interview on Sid Roth's It's Supernatural!, she shared the remarkable stories behind a ministry that defied every human limitation. We look back on that conversation as a tribute to her extraordinary legacy.

A Destiny Almost Missed

Before Marilyn Hickey became one of the most recognizable voices in Spirit-filled Christianity, she was a schoolteacher and a self-described “nice Christian” who wasn’t fully committed to God’s call.

It was her fiancé who issued the challenge that changed everything. “I’m not going to marry a woman who’s half-hearted for God,” he told her plainly, according to Hickey’s account in the interview. He went on a three-day fast, and God used those three days to confront her with a choice. On the third night, she recalled, the Lord spoke to her heart: “I have something so wonderful for you. You cannot imagine.”

She said yes – and the destiny that unfolded would take her to over 100 countries and millions of souls.

Faith That Refused to Quit

One of the most powerful testimonies Hickey shared was about her own body. Doctors had told her she could never have a child due to an inherited condition. At a William Branham crusade in Dallas, she was called out of an audience of 5,000 people by a man who had never met her, and told to “go home and receive your child.”

Ten years passed. Two doctors dismissed her condition as something other than pregnancy. A third confirmed she was five and a half months along. Her daughter Sarah was born, a miracle held in suspense for a decade.

“You don’t have three strikes and you’re out,” Hickey told Roth with characteristic directness. “You are only out if you quit swinging.”

That same tenacity carried her through another health scare years later. After discovering a fast-growing lump, she spent 24 hours confessing healing scripture over her body – once per hour, for 24 repetitions. “This word is health to my flesh,” she declared aloud. By morning, the lump was gone.

The Woman Who Walked Into a Mosque

Perhaps the defining image of Hickey’s ministry was what she described as a historic first: a woman proclaiming Jesus inside an American mosque, with healings following.

The breakthrough came through years of relationship-building with an imam in Detroit who had initially refused her request. When she returned to the city months later, he had changed his mind. “We can do that,” he told her. Hickey taught one miracle of Jesus from the Bible, prayed for the sick and healings broke out – including a young man who had opened the service reading from the Quran and had no distance vision. God healed his eyes that night.

“It wasn’t a big crowd,” she recalled, “but afterwards they always have refreshments, and I just decided to go from table to table.” Imams asked her to pray for their backs, their families. The same imam who had once said no later invited her back, and after Hickey prayed over him and his wife, who also could not conceive, they went on to have two children.

210,000 Muslims and ‘Ridiculous Favor’

In Pakistan where she had first traveled in 1995, despite warnings that she would be shot, Hickey eventually ministered to over 210,000 people in a single crusade. She was 80 years old.

“God’s not looking at your age,” she told Roth. “God’s not interested in your color. God’s not interested in your gender. What he responds to is your faith in Jesus.”

Her bridge into Muslim communities, she explained, was healing ministry. “They love healing miracles because in the Quran it says that Jesus heals,” she said. On her second trip to Pakistan, a blind imam received his sight and came to publicly testify on video. “You’ll never forget Jesus when you’re blind and you can see,” Roth observed.

Marilyn Hickey finished her race well. Her message to every believer who felt too old or too unlikely for greatness remained as simple as it was unshakable: “God thinks you can do anything.”

Jonathan Cahn Declares Ezekiel's Warning: Is America Listening?

In a moment that is already stirring fresh intrigue, President Donald Trump hinted that long-awaited answers surrounding UFOs may soon be unveiled.

Speaking during a White House event honoring NASA Artemis II astronauts, Trump addressed growing public curiosity about unidentified aerial phenomena—and suggested that new disclosures could be just ahead.

“You’re Going to Be Reading About It”

When asked about the status of UFO files, Trump did not dismiss the question. Instead, he leaned into it.

“I think we’re going to be releasing as much as we can in the near future,” he said. “Anything having to do with UFO or related material, we’re going to be releasing a lot of things from that we have.”

He pointed to firsthand testimony from credible witnesses as part of what has fueled ongoing interest.

“I’ve interviewed some pilots... very solid people,” Trump said. “And they said they saw things that you wouldn’t believe.”

A Nation Looking Upward Again

While the mystery of UFOs captured attention, the broader theme of this particular event was America's renewed commitment to space exploration.

Standing alongside NASA leadership and astronauts, Trump celebrated what he described as a dramatic resurgence in U.S. space efforts.

"We have some people that have captivated the attention of the whole world... they're very brave," Trump said, praising the astronauts behind recent missions.

Central to that renewed vision is NASA's Artemis program, which aims to return Americans to the moon for the first time in decades.

Back to the Moon—And Beyond

Officials outlined an ambitious but increasingly tangible roadmap:

- Artemis II has already completed a mission around the moon
- Artemis III is scheduled for launch in 2027
- Additional missions in 2028 could place astronauts back on the lunar surface

Trump expressed confidence in the timeline, noting that progress is already ahead of expectations.

"We have a good shot," he said. "We've authorized it... and I think with this team... we have a good shot."

The president also emphasized the broader importance of space advancement—not just for exploration, but for national security and technological leadership.

"I like space," Trump added. "A lot of what we're doing militarily... comes from space."

As discussions of UFO disclosure grow louder and America prepares to once again plant its flag on the moon, the coming years may prove pivotal—not only for science and exploration, but for humanity's understanding of what lies beyond.
