

Kathryn Krick Warns: Spiritual Promotion Will Trigger Spiritual Warfare

Author and Bible teacher Autumn Miles is encouraging Christians facing sudden change not to mistake transition for defeat.

Appearing in a recent interview with Daystar, Miles opened up about surviving domestic abuse, encountering the voice of God during one of the darkest nights of her life and receiving what she believes is a timely prophetic message for believers navigating unexpected seasons of uncertainty.

Miles recalled reaching a breaking point after enduring years of physical, emotional and psychological abuse in her first marriage.

“When you’re suffering for so long, you just want out,” she said.

She admitted she had begun believing lies that God wanted her dead and that there was no hope left. Then, during what she described as a supernatural encounter around 3 a.m., everything changed.

“I could feel the supernatural fight for me. I could feel demonic forces and godly forces fighting for me,” Miles said.

As she cried out to God, she said she heard the Holy Spirit ask a simple but life-altering question: “Do you remember Me?”

Desperate for an answer, Miles opened her Bible to Psalm 91.

“I needed deliverance,” she said. “I needed to get out of that situation.”

She surrendered her life to Christ that night and says she worshipped for three hours, an encounter she believes permanently altered the trajectory of her life.

Although she eventually divorced her abusive husband, the journey that followed proved equally painful. Miles said the church she attended disciplined her because she pursued a divorce despite the abuse.

“They put me up for church discipline,” she recalled.

Rather than allowing bitterness to take root, however, Miles said God eventually led her toward forgiveness after studying the book of Job.

That experience later inspired her latest book, Holy Ghosted, which explores the painful seasons when believers feel abandoned by God.

“I think we need to understand that there are hard places in God,” Miles said. “God says nothing to Job for 38 chapters.”

Instead of viewing God’s silence as rejection, Miles argues believers should remember His unchanging character and trust His previous faithfulness until His voice becomes clear again.

Later in the broadcast, Miles shifted into what she described as a prophetic word centered on Joshua chapter 1.

“I want to tell you something,” she declared. “You still have a Jericho ahead of you to conquer.”

Addressing Christians who have recently experienced divorce, devastating medical diagnoses, or unexpected life changes, Miles said these situations often feel frightening because they force people to leave familiar seasons behind.

“The season might change,” she said, “but the mission is the same.”

Drawing from God’s repeated command to Joshua, Miles emphasized that fear causes believers to forget God’s promises.

“Be strong and courageous. Don’t fear or be dismayed, for the Lord your God is with you wherever you go.”

She encouraged viewers not to become fixated on what has ended but instead to prepare for what God is leading them into next.

Joshua’s greatest victories came after the wilderness, she noted, suggesting that many believers today may likewise be standing on the threshold of their own promised land. Miles’ testimony serves as a reminder that God’s greatest assignments often begin immediately after life’s most difficult chapters.

God Is Preparing You for Transition: Here’s How to

Know It's Time to Move

Amanda Grace of Ark of Grace Ministries says the church is entering a critical hour where praise must become more than a song—it must become a weapon.

In a newly released prophetic message, Grace said she believes the Lord is calling Christians to prepare for a season of spiritual warfare, political shaking and revival. The lengthy word touched on breakthrough, Europe, Israel, America and the global church, while repeatedly urging Christians to pray, discern and remain anchored in Scripture.

Praise Is the Church's Weapon

Grace opened the message by emphasizing praise as a spiritual strategy for believers in times of warfare.

“Judah means praise,” Grace said. “A church that can praise is a church that can push through.”

According to Grace, praise is not merely an emotional expression, but a weapon that shifts atmospheres, breaks resistance and positions believers for victory.

“Praise has a purpose. Praise is a weapon,” she said, adding that praise “produces an atmospheric shift that opens gates and brings down obstacles for answers to push through.”

Grace also said praise helps believers exchange heaviness for freedom, reminding viewers that God “inhabits the praises of His people.”

Pressure Before Revival

Grace then turned to what she described as a coming season of pressing that will produce spiritual oil.

“This is the as the pressure mounts and the pressing occurs, the praise from His people will produce the oil of anointing,” she said.

She predicted radical encounters with Jesus among media personalities, political figures and those who have openly rejected biblical faith. Grace said some who have pushed anti-Christian ideologies for years would renounce them after supernatural encounters with Christ.

She also pointed to revival beyond America, referencing Europe, the Middle East, India and Indonesia as places where she believes God will move in unexpected ways.

Spain Faces a Prophetic Warning

One of the more specific portions of Grace's message centered on Spain.

According to Grace, the nation is approaching both political instability and spiritual reckoning. She said Spain's leadership would “disintegrate” within the next year and claimed hostility toward the Jewish people would bring economic consequences.

“The alluring aroma of hatred for My people has allowed you to eat the bitter scroll of persecution, and it shall sour your economy,” Grace said.

She then compared what she described as current spiritual and political developments to an attempted revival of the Spanish Inquisition, saying the effort would ultimately turn back on those behind it.

“However, I, the Lord thy God, this day say it shall not be an inquisition against My people, but against you, O leader of Spain,” Grace said.

Grace added that European leaders would face scrutiny while people across the continent would “march in the streets and cry for Jesus Christ.”

Islam, Terror Networks and Intercession

Grace also delivered a sharp warning concerning Islamic extremism, alleged terror networks and spiritual warfare in Europe and America.

She claimed hidden plots, financial pipelines and infiltration efforts would be exposed, saying even those within such circles would become whistleblowers.

“As they yell Allah in the streets of Ireland, in the streets of England, in the city hubs of your nation, O America, the name Adonai shall start as a whisper and turn into a thunderous battle cry,” Grace said.

She continued by saying, “What is hidden deep in their mosques—the blueprints for takeovers, for infiltration, for terror attacks—I, the Lord thy God, by My Spirit shall compel their own to turn them in.”

Grace specifically mentioned Dearborn, Michigan, predicting what she called “a reverse exodus,” in which “the infiltrators shall become the detectors, shall become the whistleblowers.”

She also urged believers to pray for Texas and Florida, warning of alleged terror plots targeting city halls, senators, mayors and governors.

“Intercede and pray for the governors of Florida and Texas,” Grace said.

Israel, America and the Call to Watch

Grace also warned of political danger in Israel and America, including alleged attempts to destabilize leadership and bring a national crisis.

She referenced Israel's government, the Knesset and the U.S. Congress, warning of a possible crisis window stretching from September toward the midterms.

The message was not framed as a call to panic, but as a call to intercession.

"Intercede and pray," Grace repeated throughout the word.

Hope for the Faithful

Despite the intensity of the warnings, Grace ended with encouragement for believers who have remained faithful through pressure.

"The voices who have spoken be amplified and elevated in this hour," she said. "Opportunity shall now suddenly come."

Grace closed by urging viewers to test the spirit, stay in Scripture, remain watchful and "armor up according to Ephesians chapter 6."

The message is clear: this is not the hour to shrink back. It is the hour to praise, pray, discern and stand firm as the shaking gives way to the purposes of God.

Islamic Call to Prayer Faces Major Government Crackdown

Denmark is weighing whether the Islamic call to prayer should be heard over loudspeakers in its public spaces.

According to The Telegraph, Danish Immigration and Integration Minister Morten Bødskov has declared that the government will once again examine whether it can legally prohibit the public broadcasting of the Islamic call to prayer, known as the adhan. This will be the third time in recent years that Denmark's Social Democratic-led government has explored the possibility of implementing such a ban.

"The Islamic call to prayer has no place in Denmark," Bødskov said. "The call to prayer should not be heard over Danish rooftops. It has no place in Denmark, and you shouldn't doubt whether you've ended up in a suburb of Islamabad when you walk around Denmark," MSN quoted him as stating.

Rather than introducing immediate legislation, the Danish government is first reopening a legal review to determine whether a nationwide ban would comply with the country's constitution and its obligations under European human rights law.

While mass Islamic immigration has hit Europe and rapidly changed its demographics, America is starting to see this same ripple shift things. New York City not only has the first-ever Muslim mayor, but through his influence, multiple other socialists are now set to take over political positions in the state. The Muslim call to prayer has already affected those living in New York City since Mamdani's rise to power.

Meanwhile in the Islamic Republic of Downtown Houston.

Texas continues to be inundated with Islam as well, with a recent viral video on social media showing the streets of downtown Houston lined up with Muslim women in hijabs walking through the city, with flags touting Arabic on them, while the men sang songs.

The question is no longer whether or not Islam will affect Western society. It already has. The question now: Will we allow it to change the very core of our nation?

Christian MLB Players Publicly Shamed for Standing on God's Word

For a few San Francisco Giants pitchers, writing a Bible verse on a baseball cap became more than a personal expression of faith—it became the catalyst for public protests against Christians who hold a biblical conviction regarding homosexuality.

According to Fox News' OutKick, demonstrators gathered outside Oracle Park ahead of the Giants' June 23 matchup against the Athletics to condemn the Giants pitchers who declined to fully participate in the team's Pride Night celebration. The protest followed the club's June 12 Pride Night game, when pitchers Landen Roupp, JT Brubaker and Ryan Walker wrote Genesis 9:12-16 on their rainbow-themed caps, while pitcher Sam Hentges chose not to wear the special cap at all because of his Christian convictions.

The passage from Genesis tells the story of God's covenant with Noah after the flood, identifying the rainbow as the sign of His everlasting promise to humanity.

For the players, the verses represented a biblical declaration—not a political statement.

That distinction, however, did little to quiet critics.

Fox News reported that protesters carried signs denouncing the pitchers and accused them of promoting discrimination against the LGBTQ community. Some fans argued the players should no longer represent the organization if they refused to embrace Pride Night, while one self-described "LGBTQ-affirming Catholic" reportedly suggested players unwilling to wear Pride-themed apparel should be benched.

The Bible passage at the center of the controversy speaks not of division but of God's faithfulness. Genesis 9 describes the rainbow as God's covenant with every living creature—a symbol that Christians and Jews have recognized for thousands of years, long before it became associated with modern social movements. However, it is being used today as a symbol of pride, something God is actively against.

Americans have grown accustomed to seeing athletes encouraged to express social and political causes from the field. Yet when Christian players quietly reference Scripture or decline participation based on sincerely held religious convictions, they often become the targets of public condemnation rather than recipients of the same respect afforded to other viewpoints.

This moment serves as another reminder that following Christ has never promised cultural approval. Jesus Himself warned His followers that faithfulness would often invite opposition. Sometimes simply quoting Scripture is enough to ignite a national controversy—and perhaps that speaks volumes about today's culture.

Exposed: Etsy's Hidden Marketplace for Witches, Hexes and Spells

Few archaeological discoveries have reshaped conversations about the Bible quite like the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Nearly 80 years after their discovery near Qumran along the shores of the Dead Sea, the ancient manuscripts continue to provide some of the strongest historical evidence that the Old Testament we read today has been faithfully preserved—and that one of its most remarkable prophecies about the coming Messiah existed long before Jesus of Nazareth walked the earth.

In a recent teaching filmed at Qumran, Christian apologist Frank Turek stood beside Cave 4, where approximately 75% of the Dead Sea Scrolls fragments were uncovered, explaining why the discovery remains so significant.

Among the roughly 900 manuscripts recovered from the area, one stands above the rest: the Great Isaiah Scroll.

Dating to approximately 125 B.C.—more than a century before Christ's birth—the scroll contains the complete book of Isaiah, including the famous 53rd chapter describing a suffering servant who would bear the sins of many.

Reading Isaiah 53 aloud at the site, a gentleman by the name of “Pastor Vince” highlighted familiar passages that Christians have long connected to Jesus Christ: “He was pierced for our transgressions. He was crushed for our iniquities..., and by His wounds we are healed.”

For Turek, the timing of the manuscript is impossible to ignore.

To order Dinesh D'Souza's new book, The Stones Cry Out, visit .

“When you see what Vince just read written prior to Jesus, you have to ask yourself, how could they have done this?” he said. “There has to be some sort of divine insight, divine prediction.”

Just as compelling, he argued, is what happened when scholars compared the Great Isaiah Scroll with the much later Masoretic Text.

Separated by roughly 1,000 years, the two manuscripts were found to be approximately 95% identical. The remaining differences consisted primarily of spelling variations and minor word-order changes, reinforcing the remarkable care ancient Jewish scribes exercised in preserving Scripture through the centuries.

At the site, one question Turek was asked was why many Jewish people still do not recognize Isaiah 53 as referring to Jesus.

Turek responded that while early Jewish interpretation commonly viewed the chapter as messianic, later interpretations increasingly identified Israel itself as the suffering servant. He argued that interpretation ultimately falls short because Isaiah 53 describes a servant who is sinless and who bears the sins of others—characteristics that do not fit the nation of Israel, which the Old Testament repeatedly portrays as needing redemption itself.

The discussion concluded by connecting Isaiah's prophecy to the broader message of the gospel. God's justice, Turek said, required that sin be dealt with, while His love provided the sacrifice through Christ.

The ancient manuscripts do more than preserve Scripture—they testify that God’s redemptive plan was being written centuries before the events of the New Testament unfolded, offering yet another reason to trust the Bible’s reliability.
