

Old Stephen Colbert Footage Resurfaces Detailing Sacrifices and Hollywood Cults

Stephen Colbert's past skits just may have shown an even darker look into the reality of Hollywood cults and sacrifices as the dark truth of the Epstein files emerges into the light.

During an Emmy award ceremony presentation with Jon Stewart, Colbert greeted the room of Hollywood elites by saying, "Good evening, godless Sodomites."

He continues to say, "I'm bringing the truth, Jon. We're in Hollywood, the belly of the beast."

A sobering prophetic message released Feb. 16, 2026, by Amanda Grace speaks of the future of Britain's monarchy—specifically, the British royal line and what Grace describes as a "passing of the old guard" across Europe.

In the recent broadcast, Grace framed the moment as part of a larger shaking taking place in the nations, then delivered a striking portion of the word that centered on the royal houses of Europe and the signal of Big Ben itself.

According to Grace, what is unfolding is not merely political or ceremonial, but spiritual—an unraveling of ancient entanglements that spans generations of royal bloodlines. The word describes "the very old chain of the royal families of Europe" as something that "has been tethered to rulers of darkness" and linked to "very old altars of the dark ages."

The prophecy goes further, claiming divine intervention is about to cut those connections: "In this time says the Lord, by my order, I am set to cut those chains," the word declares, adding that hidden structures will be exposed: "And I the Lord shall expose the inner orders and I the Lord shall shake and sift to has been proclaimed to be an heir."

'A Sounding of Big Ben'

For British listeners, the most vivid imagery came with a reference to one of the nation's most iconic symbols. Grace speaks of "a passing of the old guard," and then announces "a sounding of big Ben, a sounding across Europe that the old guard, the old wine skins have been appointed to pass."

In this prophetic framing, the "passing" is presented as a necessary breaking—an undoing of what the message calls "chains of darkness" and "blood deals made." Grace says this shift would create space for something new within royal lines: "I the Lord shall give a period for those to rise up in faith out of such families and do my work and proclaim my word and save their children..."

A Direct Address to Princess Catherine

The most specific section of Grace's prophecy was aimed at Princess Catherine, with both warning and invitation. "Princess Catherine, I am calling you in secret," the word declares. "You have cried out to me in your heart. You have felt the bondage of religion. You have seen the chains in your children."

Grace claims the princess is being urged toward full surrender to Christ, warning of recurring affliction: "I am calling to you in this hour to break free to come fully unto me and surrender for those chains are set to afflict your body once again,” she says, describing a “cycle that goes back to William’s mother.”

Grace then ties the urgency to the next generation, stating: “Fully surrender now and you shall be spared... for the sake of your children...”

‘A Jacob and Esau Flip’

Beyond Britain, this prophetic word suggests royal upheaval in the wider European landscape with a startling phrase: “You shall see a Jacob and Esau flip... You shall see the royal families of Europe in tandem rearrange their crowns.”

Hearing this message serves as a spiritual alarm: that God can reach into even the most protected corridors of power, and that households—whether ordinary or royal—are not beyond the reach of conviction, deliverance and redemption.

‘Prophetess’ Faces 20 Years as Shocking Church Forced

Labor Case Unfolds

One “prophetess” is looking at many years behind bars.

In a report from Fox News, it was noted that Kathleen Klein, who also went by “Prophetess,” is the third person to be indicted by a Michigan federal grand jury for allegations of conspiracy and forced labor with the Kingdom of God Global Church.

Klein reportedly served as an executive and leader of the church formerly known as Joshua Media Ministries International. Klein, along with Michelle Brannon and David Taylor, was part of the team that ran call centers in Texas, Missouri, Florida and Michigan.

As Fox reported, those in call centers had to work long hours without pay to meet intense fundraising goals. Those who did not meet these goals faced “public humiliation, sleep deprivation, physical abuse, withholding of food and shelter, forced repentance rituals and threats of ‘divine judgment in the form of sickness, accidents, death, and eternal damnation,’” according to Fox.

The Department of Justice made a statement on the case, with FBI Detroit Field Office Special Agent in Charge Jennifer Runyan stating, “Forced labor is a direct assault on human strips victims of their dignity, their autonomy, and their basic right to control their own lives. Anyone who conspires to exploit and enslave others for profit will be held fully accountable under the law.”

It is believed that during this decade-long charade, the Kingdom of God Global Church received $50 million in donations, which leaders spent on vehicles, travel, luxury items and real estate.

As this case moves forward, it serves as a sobering reminder of the importance of accountability and integrity in all parts of life.

This Biblical Key Could Save America: The Mystery of the 50-Year Reset Cycle

The Jeffrey Epstein story is once again dominating headlines, and for many Americans, it remains more than a criminal case—it represents a disturbing window into how power can corrupt when accountability disappears.

As Dinesh D'Souza stated, "The Epstein story is back with a vengeance. It just won't go away." At its core, the Epstein case was about sex trafficking and exploitation. But for many watching the case unfold, the deeper concern is how someone like Epstein was able to operate for so long within elite social and political circles.

D'Souza argues that the scandal highlights "a lesson in the unaccountability of power," suggesting that the story reveals how systems can fail when influence outweighs justice. While opinions differ on how widespread that problem may be, history shows that wealth and status can sometimes shield wrongdoing.

The discussion also highlights the moral dimension of power without accountability, characterizing certain elite circles as driven by "power and sex and money." That perspective echoes Scripture's repeated warnings about what happens when humanity rejects moral authority and pursues selfish gain.

D'Souza cites a famous philosophical idea often attributed to the Russian writer Fyodor Dostoevsky: "If God is not, everything is permitted." While theologians debate the exact meaning, many Christian thinkers see it as a warning about societies that abandon moral foundations.

D'Souza also examines the role of cultural change over decades, arguing that shifting views about sexuality, relationships and power structures have altered social dynamics. He then references King David and Bathsheba, a story that powerfully illustrates how even godly leaders can fall into devastating sin. Scripture does not hide these failures—it records them to show the consequences of moral compromise and the necessity of repentance.

The Bible consistently teaches that sin is not limited to any one class or group—it is a universal human condition. The lesson we learn from the Epstein scandal should point us back to the purpose of prayer and a commitment to truth. As corruption is exposed, believers are called not to celebrate downfall, but to pursue justice, protect the vulnerable and reflect Christ's character in a broken world.
