

Fox News Returns to Pushing Witchcraft and 'Rage Rituals'

Third time's the charm, and in this case, it's the reason you should turn off Fox News in your home.

The news corporation is being lambasted by Christians, for the third time this year, for platforming the new age and witchcraft during its primetime programming.

Host Jesse Watters is starting to make a habit of shining a spotlight on the occult during his programs, which should drive every Christian viewer of his to tune out.

With neo-feminist 'rage rituals,' an event where women pay hundreds or thousands of dollars to go on a retreat to scream and hit things with sticks (no really, that's what they do) going viral on social media, Watters and his producers thought it would be a good idea to give the self-described witch a platform to deceive people.

According to the website of "Mia Magik," whose real name is Mia Banducci, she is "an ambassador for the ancient magikal way returning home to our modern day, my mission is to reclaim our unique and eternal inner wisdom, what makes us a 'Witch,' to bring our visions to fruition. My life is dedicated to reawakening the power of the feminine Divine Nature for us all to reconnect with the unconditionally loving Great Mother Goddess on our planet."

Meanwhile, Fox is trying to paint itself as a God-honoring, conservative platform by occasionally posting faith-based content, then creating spiritual mixture by promoting the occult.

Be warned: these two things cannot go together, and when they do it is not Christianity but is instead syncretism.

Calling out this spiritual danger is former witch-turned-Christian Jenn Nizza, who recognizes the spiritual danger Fox News is putting their audience in by opening the door for demonic influence in peoples' lives.

"The problem with this is, one, you're pointing to something demonic—you're pointing to man, and you're pointing to the devil—to heal from trauma wounds, and it can't heal," says Nizza. "Beating the earth until you're blue in the face cannot heal you; opening demonic doors by going to something that's led by a witch leads to further oppression, so you're going to the problem for the solution.

"This is such a complete disgusting demonic contradiction, opposite of God's Word, and that's the agenda. The money is the icing on the cake, because you're not going to have the devil without money. It's going to cost you and cost you, and you're going to be that little hamster on the wheel. That's what it is, because there's not any solution. There's no true healing. Demons don't heal. Demons don't care about your daddy issues. They don't care. They just want you to stay away from God," she continues.

40% of Christians Disengaged: The Biggest Threat to Christianity?

Voices are gradually rising as many realize Christianity is on the brink of worldwide persecution.

The West has abandoned the principles on which it was built, and is instead silencing the voices of any who declare the ways of God and the salvation found in Jesus Christ. It has turned its back on the ways of God and embraced the ways of man.

But is persecution the greatest threat facing the spread of the Gospel message today?

According to George Barna, founder of the market research firm The Barna Group, in an interview with The Christian Post, there are several “negative trends” that have led to the loss of cultural influence and relevance for the Christian faith, leading to “Christian invisibility in our culture.

“People have become more selfish, churches have become less influential, pastors have become less Bible-centric,” Barna says. “Families have invested less of their time and energy in spiritual growth, particularly of their children. The media now influence the church more than the church influences the media, or the culture for that matter. The Christian body tends to get off track arguing about a lot of things that really don’t matter.”

How did we get here? When did the faith traditions that built the West become afterthoughts in society, and a punching bag of Western media?

Barna points to the lack of proper discipleship from old to new generations of leaders which has led to a decay of influence over the years.

“There is poor leadership in seminaries that mislead local churches into thinking that they’re actually training individuals whom God has called to be leaders and are qualified to be leaders and certifying them to lead local churches, not knowing any better bringing them on,” warns Barna.

As recently as January 2022, The Barna Group discovered, only a mere 28% of Christians are engaged in “Discipleship Community,” and 39% aren’t engaged in discipleship in any form whatsoever.

Instead of holding coming generations up to the Bible’s standard, we have instead been conforming ourselves to the world’s standard, trying to wrap the Bible around that, instead of wrapping our views around the Bible.

“You get what you measure,” he continues. “So if you measure the wrong things, you’ll get the wrong outcomes ... [pastors] measure how many people show up, how much money they raise, how many programs they offer, how many staff persons they hire, how much square footage they built out. Jesus didn’t die for any of that. So we’re measuring the wrong stuff and, consequently, we get the wrong outcomes.”

So how do we as the corporate body of Christ fix this predicament we are in?

It's all about getting back to biblical basics, according to Barna.

"If we were to go back to the Bible, I think we'd recognize the local church, the institutional church, as we've created it, is man-made. It's not in the Scriptures," he said. "The programs, the titles, the buildings, all the stuff that has become sacrosanct in American culture and around the world is not necessarily biblical.

"Jesus didn't come to build institutions, He came to build people. And we see that model in His life. He devoted the ministry portion of His life to investing in individuals. And that's what each of us who are followers of Christ need to be doing."

With proper, biblical discipleship and the establishment of relationships that can weather the storms of life, the church can once again be the light that societies around the world so desperately need it to be.

Parental Outrage as School Keeps 'Genderqueer Witch' Speaker Under Wraps

America has reached a sad state in her education where students are simply not safe in public schools anymore.

The threat of physical violence in many of the nation's schools is not the only, or even most dangerous, factor facing young Americans today.

It is the schools' constant indoctrination into dark and deceptive practices and ideologies that have left an entire generation confused and spiritually oppressed.

Things are so bad that social media accounts like Libs of TikTok have risen to the mainstream of society because they hold a mirror up to horrific practices being pushed onto children across the nation.

A recent exposure of deception and attacks aimed at parents of the Unionville-Chadds Ford School District in southeastern Pennsylvania showcases how hostile the public school system has become toward parents and their children.

The district, which gaslighted parents accusing them of spreading "misinformation" when first confronted over a sexual survey given to students by "genderqueer witch" Deni Tobin, has finally admitted to the breach of trust and inappropriate actions taking place within their schools.

As reported by The Daily Wire, "Unionville High School Principal Amy Jenkins admitted the surveys, from the Chester County Crime Victims Center, had been administered without proper parental consent in a summary of her shared with The Daily Wire."

Jenkins revealed that the districts own policy regarding giving students surveys "was not followed and necessary parental notice should have been issued in advance of such surveys consistent with the Protection of Pupil Rights Amendment."

Considering the administration attacked parents before admitting their guilt, this looks like a case of “sorry we got caught” as opposed to “sorry we broke your trust.”

One parent, Chad Williams, has also accused the districts superintendent, John Sanville of stonewalling requests for transparency in the matter.

Meanwhile, parents still have unanswered questions and valid concerns about how Tobin was ever given access to children with presentations filled with “both witch-themed and sexually explicit material—[with] one picture features Tobin topless, showcasing that she had her breasts removed.”

Parents in all states must be vigilant in their children’s education. Far too often students are not being educated, but are instead being indoctrinated and led down a spiritually oppressive path by those who have no business being involved in the school system.

There is a biblical duty for parents to be involved in their children’s upbringing, and this includes holding those accountable who seek to brainwash their children with radical and harmful ideologies.
