

‘More Truth Than Fiction’: Steven Spielberg’s ‘Disclosure Day’ Film Sparks End Times Warning

Perez Hilton is stepping into a new season, openly sharing his first time reading the Bible while inviting millions into his personal life, struggles and beliefs.

“I am reading it from start to finish for the first time, and sharing scripture that resonates,” Hilton said, describing what has become a deeply personal spiritual journey.

He pointed to Genesis 24, reflecting on Isaac and Rebekah, and connected it to his own desire for love. “Love, however, is something that I would love and I see it coming in the future,” he said. “It’s going to be a mature love.”

At the same time, Hilton addressed the intense public focus on his sexuality and faith. “I am gay. I am very gay,” he said. “This is how God made me.” He added, “I know that God is real. I know that God saved me. And I know that God loves me.”

His openness about God’s presence in his life marks a significant shift, and it is right to recognize the importance of that step. A hunger for Scripture and a willingness to speak about God publicly is not something to dismiss. It is the beginning of something that must now be grounded in truth.

What Scripture Clearly Says

The Bible speaks directly and consistently on sexual ethics, both in the Old and New Testaments.

In Leviticus 18:22, Scripture says, “You shall not lie with a male as with a woman. It is an abomination.”

The New Testament reinforces this teaching through Paul the Apostle in Romans 1:26–27:

For this reason, God gave them up to dishonorable passions. Their women exchanged natural relations for unnatural ones. Likewise, the men, leaving the natural relations with women, burned in their lust for one another, men with men committing what is shameful, and receiving in themselves the due penalty of their error.

Paul’s words are not vague. He identifies same-sex relations as outside God’s design, describing them as unnatural and contrary to God’s created order established in Genesis.

He continues this teaching in 1 Corinthians 6:9–11, declaring that those who practice sexual immorality, including homosexual acts, will not inherit the kingdom of God. Yet the passage does not end in judgment. It declares transformation. “And such were some of you. But you were washed, but you were sanctified.”

The Call to Repentance and New Life

Hilton’s statement, “I don’t believe in everything that the Bible says. I believe in what I know,” reveals the critical crossroads he now faces.

Faith in Christ is not built on selecting truth. It is built on surrender to the full authority of God’s Word.

Jesus calls every believer to be born again. That means leaving behind every part of the old life that conflicts with Scripture and walking in obedience to what God defines as righteous. This call is not unique to one sin or one struggle. It applies to all.

Hilton has already taken a meaningful first step by opening the Bible and acknowledging God's reality. Now comes the deeper step. Repentance. Surrender. Transformation.

A Loving but Firm Encouragement

Hilton needs to be surrounded by strong, mature believers who will disciple him, walk with him and anchor him in Scripture. A Bible-believing church is essential.

God's love is real. Hilton is right about that. But God's love does not affirm every lifestyle. It calls people out of sin and into holiness.

The same Word Hilton is reading is the same Word that calls him higher.

The invitation is open. Not just to believe in God, but to be transformed by Him.

Hero 5-Year-Old Saves Brother From Icy Creek, Now Fighting for His Life

A 5-year-old Minnesota boy is being hailed for his courage and selflessness after saving his younger brother from an icy creek on Easter Sunday, a moment that has become a powerful testimony of love, sacrifice and faith.

Ashkan Thibodeaux and his younger brother, Wyatt, were exploring near a creek in Itasca County when tragedy struck. As reported by Breitbart, Wyatt slipped into the freezing water and could not get out. Without hesitation, Ashkan jumped in. As a GoFundMe page described, "Ashkan didn't hesitate for a second. He saw the danger and jumped in to save his brother, guiding him to safety and saving his life."

Both boys survived, but Ashkan suffered serious injuries in the process. He endured internal damage and slight brain trauma and was placed on life support before doctors were able to stabilize him. He has since undergone multiple surgeries, including procedures involving his appendix and portions of his intestines.

Despite the severity of his condition, signs of hope are emerging.

In recent days, Ashkan has been able to sit up in a chair, bringing relief to his family and community. His loved ones declared, "God has been working, and we will continue to watch Him work today."

Support has poured in from across the community. A GoFundMe campaign has raised more than $48,000 to help cover mounting medical expenses, while local hockey moms have organized additional fundraisers. One supporter emphasized the family's greatest need, saying, "They want everybody to know that they need prayer. He's got a long road [ahead]."

Ashkan's bravery reflects the kind of sacrificial love that points us back to Christ, reminding us of the power of stepping in to save another, no matter the cost. As his recovery continues, we stand together in faith, believing for healing and restoration.

Let us lift up Ashkan and Wyatt, along with their family, in prayer. May God strengthen their bodies, bring complete healing and surround them with peace, provision and unwavering hope in this difficult season.

Toxic Air Emergency: Stay Indoors Advisories Issued as Dangerous Smoke Chokes

Multiple US States

Air quality alerts stretched across multiple states on Wednesday as wildfire smoke and pollution pushed conditions into dangerous territory, forcing officials to urge residents to remain indoors.

“Thousands of Americans are breathing in toxins on Wednesday morning, prompting advisories to stay indoors whenever possible,” the Daily Mail reported.

Air quality maps showed “Unhealthy” zones across parts of Georgia, Alabama, Florida and New Mexico, driven by elevated levels of PM2.5. The report described these as “microscopic particles consisting of toxic organic compounds or heavy metals... creating hazardous conditions.”

Forecasters said the situation is being fueled by wildfire smoke drifting across state lines and settling over communities. “Pollution zones are likely to persist through the weekend,” the report stated, noting that calm winds and overnight conditions are trapping smoke near the ground.

The hardest-hit areas include:

- Central Georgia: Macon and Warner Robins in the most severe zones
- Southwest Georgia: Albany, with pollution spreading toward Valdosta
- Coastal Georgia: Brunswick and areas near Savannah
- Northern Florida: Counties along the Georgia border
- North-central Florida: Lake City, Gainesville and Putnam County
- Central Florida: Areas near Ocala seeing fluctuating conditions

- Florida Panhandle and Jacksonville region: Moderate to unhealthy levels
- Southern New Mexico: Las Cruces and the Mesilla Valley

Health officials warned of serious risks tied to prolonged exposure. "Health experts caution that prolonged exposure can trigger respiratory problems, aggravate asthma, strain the heart and contribute to long-term lung damage," according to the report.

Authorities across the affected states are urging residents to limit outdoor activity. "Officials have issued air quality advisories, urging residents in the hardest-hit areas to avoid strenuous outdoor activity and remain indoors when possible," the report said.

Dry conditions continue to worsen the crisis. "As long as dry weather continues, experts say the region will remain vulnerable to sudden swings in air quality," the Daily Mail reported.

Relief remains uncertain. "Meaningful relief is unlikely until steady rainfall moves into the region," forecasters said, with drought conditions expected to keep fire danger and smoke risks elevated into May.

Iran AI Video Depicts Statue of Liberty as Baal, Then Blows It Up, in Ominous Warning

A viral video featuring South Korean figure YoungHoon Kim is drawing widespread attention after he declared that Jesus Christ is coming soon, delivering a message filled with urgency, conviction and bold claims about the end of history.

Kim, who claims to have an IQ of 276, has built a following by presenting himself as an intellectual voice connecting science, philosophy and Christianity. His intelligence claims remain widely disputed, but his statements about Jesus are rapidly gaining traction online.

In the video, Kim makes his position unmistakably clear: "Jesus Christ will return in our generation." He goes further, stating, "I declare Jesus Christ is God and He is returning now," framing his conclusion as both logical and divinely revealed.

Kim repeatedly ties the timing of Christ's return to the present era, saying, "The second coming of Jesus in this generation means that our generation will see the end of history."

He points to global instability, moral decline and rapid technological change as evidence, adding, "When you see these things begin to happen, know that I am near, right at the door."

While emphasizing urgency, Kim also addresses timing directly: “I do not know the exact time. But I believe the return of Jesus is very near, perhaps within 10 years.” He reinforces the call to readiness with a simple message: “Be ready... Time is very near.”

His message centers on the certainty of Christ’s return as both warning and hope. “Jesus will come again... it will be the return of the King,” he says, describing a visible, global event that brings judgment and restoration.

Scripture teaches that no one knows the exact day or hour of Christ’s return, while calling for watchfulness and readiness, as seen in Matthew 24 and 1 Thessalonians 5.

Claims surrounding Kim’s reported IQ continue to face scrutiny, with experts noting that extremely high scores are difficult to verify and often exceed the limits of standardized testing.

Oil Prices Plunge After Iran Reopens Strait of Hormuz to

Shipping

Oil markets reacted swiftly on Friday after Iran signaled a temporary reopening of one of the world's most critical shipping routes, easing fears of prolonged disruption to global energy supplies.

The Strait of Hormuz will remain accessible to commercial vessels during a 10-day ceasefire tied to the Israel-Lebanon conflict, Fox News reported. Iranian Foreign Minister Abbas Araghchi confirmed the passage would be open, while a senior Iranian official said ships would move through designated safe lanes, though naval vessels remain restricted.

In line with the ceasefire in Lebanon, the passage for all commercial vessels through Strait of Hormuz is declared completely open for the remaining period of ceasefire, on the coordinated route as already announced by Ports and Maritime Organisation of the Islamic Rep. of Iran.

– Seyed Abbas Araghchi (@araghchi) April 17, 2026

President Donald Trump confirmed the strategic balance in place, posting that the strait is “COMPLETELY OPEN AND READY FOR BUSINESS AND FULL PASSAGE,” while adding that the U.S. naval blockade targeting Iran will remain “IN FULL FORCE AND EFFECT... UNTIL SUCH TIME AS OUR TRANSACTION WITH IRAN IS 100% COMPLETE.”

Oil prices tumble on reopening news

The announcement sent oil prices sharply lower after weeks of volatility driven by conflict in the region. West Texas Intermediate crude fell more than 10% to under $85 per barrel, while Brent crude dropped more than 10% to around $89.

Markets had previously surged during the height of tensions, with WTI peaking near $113 and Brent climbing above $119. Analysts now see the potential for a continued decline. Brian Therien, senior analyst at Edward Jones, said, "While U.S. restrictions on Iranian ports remain in place, oil futures markets are also retreating, now implying crude prices could move back toward the low-$70s by year-end."

Order Troy Anderson's New Book, "Designated Disrupter" on !

The Strait of Hormuz remains a vital artery for global energy, carrying roughly one-fifth of the world's oil and liquefied natural gas. Its earlier closure amid threats of Iranian attacks and sea mines had rattled markets and raised concerns about supply shocks.

Shipping companies are proceeding carefully. Some firms have delayed transit while evaluating safety conditions, citing ongoing uncertainty. Industry leaders welcomed the reopening but warned that risks such as sea mines and unclear enforcement measures remain unresolved.

Still, the reopening of the strait and the sharp drop in oil prices signal a potential turning point. If the downward trend holds, Americans could soon begin to feel some long-awaited relief at the gas pump.

NASA Astronaut Breaks Down After Seeing Cross Following Artemis II Space Mission

Astronauts on the recent Artemis II mission are offering a rare glimpse into how seeing Earth from deep space is stirring something far deeper than science. It is awakening a sense of wonder that points straight to the Creator.

Commander Reid Wiseman, who has traveled more than 250,000 miles to the moon and back, described one of the most emotional moments of his life not in orbit, but after returning home.

“I’m not really a religious person but there was no other avenue for me to explain anything or experience anything,” Wiseman said. “So I asked for the chaplain on the Navy ship to just come visit us for a minute. When that man walked in ... I saw the cross on his collar and I just broke down in tears.”

NEW: Astronaut Reid Wiseman, who says he is not religious, says he broke down in tears when he saw the Cross after getting back to Earth.

Wiseman: "I'm not really a religious person, but there was just no other avenue for me to explain anything..."

Victor Glover: "The only..."

– Collin Rugg (@CollinRugg) April 16, 2026

For a man who does not claim faith, the experience left him searching for language beyond science. He described the mission as “other-worldly and amazing,” admitting it is “very hard to fully grasp what we just went through.”

Yet Wiseman was not alone in that response. Pilot Victor Glover, an outspoken Christian, said his experience aligned completely.

“The only thing I would add is I am a religious person, but everything else is the same,” Glover said.

That unity between belief and disbelief speaks volumes. Whether approaching space with faith or without it, both men encountered the same overwhelming reality.

Order Amanda Grace's New Book, "Brace For Impact" on !

During the 10-day mission, the crew witnessed Earth appearing to set behind the moon, a rare solar eclipse and the vast depth of the galaxy stretching into darkness. Wiseman recalled one moment in particular: “I don't think humanity has evolved to the point of being able to comprehend what we are looking at right now.”

Astronauts have long described this phenomenon as the Overview Effect, a shift in perspective that brings awe, humility and a deeper awareness of humanity's place in creation. From that vantage point, Earth is no longer divided by borders or politics. It is fragile, suspended in the vastness of space.

The Artemis II crew, which also includes Christina Koch and Jeremy Hansen, set a new record for the farthest humans have traveled from Earth. Their mission tested the Orion spacecraft ahead of future lunar landings, with NASA aiming to return astronauts to the moon's surface by 2028.

But beyond the technical milestones, something else is becoming clear. When men and women step outside the boundaries of Earth and gaze back at creation from the edge of the cosmos, the response is often the same.

Awe. Wonder. And a recognition that what they are seeing cannot be explained by science alone.
