

Jack Hibbs Warns: The Return of the Old Gods Signals a Coming Demonic Invasion

After nearly 2,000 years buried beneath layers of destruction, the ancient Pilgrimage Road leading from the Pool of Siloam to the Temple Mount has reopened to the public, marking a historic moment in Jerusalem's unfolding story.

The update was highlighted in a recent video by Keresh Art Israel, which documented the newly accessible pathway once traveled by Jewish pilgrims ascending to the Temple.

"For 2,000 years, this road has been inaccessible," the video states. "It's been buried under layers of destruction. Now it's open. Now we have a path to the Temple. We just need to walk it."

The road begins at the Pool of Siloam, where Jewish worshipers in the Second Temple period would ritually purify themselves before ascending toward the House of the Lord. Today, visitors can once again trace that same route, step by step, toward Har Habayit, the Temple Mount.

"It was here where a road led God's people to their Creator," U.S. Secretary of State Marco Rubio said during remarks played from the opening ceremony. "It was here that a road that led them to be as close as they possibly could, not just to the Creator of our species, but of the heavens and the earth and all the universe."

Rubio reflected on the rise and fall of empires that once conquered Jerusalem.

"As you go through the layers of history, you realize that all the civilizations that conquered this city, all the ones who tore it down and build on top are all gone," he said. "The Roman Empire is no more, nor any of the others that sought to conquer and rule this land. But one people remain. They have returned, for God's promise is eternal and it is perfect and His word is always true."

The reopened path leads worshipers to the southwestern corner of the Temple Mount near Robinson's Arch, one of the ancient entrances before the Roman destruction in A.D. 70. Though access today is limited, Jewish visitors continue to ascend via the wooden bridge at the Mughrabi Gate, the only entrance currently permitted for Jewish access.

On the eastern side of the Temple Mount, Jews were seen praying and studying Torah near the area long associated with the entrance to the Holy of Holies. "This is the final ascent to the peak of the mountain to the Holy of Holies where the Temple will stand," the video declares. "Today obviously we have not yet built it, but there's still one part of the service that we can do, and that is to bow down to Hashem on the Har Habayit."

Plans announced during the opening ceremony point toward even greater developments. A new Kedem Center is expected to serve as a gateway to the Old City, allowing "millions to once again walk this road." A cable car system is projected to bring 3,000 people per hour to the area.

"When the Third Temple is built, not only Jews, but people from all the nations of the world will come here by plane, by train, by cable car to serve God together here on this mountain," the video states.

The growing movement toward renewed Temple worship stands in sharp contrast to theological systems that deny the literal fulfillment of end times prophecy. Scripture speaks plainly. The prophets foretold Israel's regathering. They foretold Jerusalem's restoration. They foretold a Temple standing once again in the last days.

Those promises are not metaphors. They are realities unfolding before the eyes of the world.

The reopening of the Pilgrimage Road is not merely an archaeological achievement. It is a visible reminder that God's covenant with Israel endures. The Jewish people have returned. Jerusalem is thriving. Temple-focused education and preparation are increasing. Infrastructure is being built to accommodate millions.

The evidence is unmistakable.

This is not an impossible dream. "It is a living path," the video concludes, "and it's now open to the entire world."

The stones are speaking. The road is open. And the prophetic clock continues to move forward exactly as Scripture declared.

Prophecy Revealed: Jerusalem and the Fulfillment of the Times of the Gentiles

A Christian entertainment executive is raising alarms over what he describes as intentional censorship of faith-based content by major technology companies.

In a recent interview with CBN News, Brent Dusing, CEO of Truplay, said Google and TikTok have blocked his company from advertising because of its Christian message, even while allegedly permitting satanic and sexually explicit content to circulate freely.

Dusing's company, Truplay, is a mobile entertainment platform designed for children and families. Available on Apple and Android devices, the platform features games, comics and videos built on biblical foundations. "True Play is an entertainment platform on mobile devices," Dusing said. "It's an amazing platform with great games, comics, different video content that kids can play and use that kids love and enjoy, but that everything that True Play has inside it has a biblical foundation to it."

He said the goal is to give families content they can trust while strengthening children's faith and character. "We [have] really done it so that families have something they can trust that also build their kids' faith and their character," he said.

Despite the family-friendly focus, Dusing contends Google and TikTok have refused to allow Truplay to advertise. "TikTok and Google have both been discriminating against us very overtly because our content is Christian," he said.

According to Dusing, the ad bans have lasted more than a year and involve multiple rejected campaigns. "I'm not talking about one ad got banned," he said. "I'm talking about simple, benign, you know, gracious ads that we've had." He cited messaging such as "turn game time into God time" and "finally, a fun place to play for your kids" as examples of content that was rejected.

Dusing said the companies informed him that Truplay could not "push religious ideology." At the same time, he argues other spiritual and occult imagery is permitted. "They've allowed satanic content to be pushed in Roblox," he said. "There's literally ads where there's a pentagram drawn in blood with blood all over the floor."

He further claimed that sexual content and transgender themes in gaming ads are widely distributed while Christian products are blocked. "They allow those ads by the millions every day," he said. "They don't allow Truplay to advertise fun, safe Christian games, games where you can grow in your faith."

Dusing said he has heard from other Christian leaders facing similar restrictions. Speaking about a CPAC conference on religious freedom, he said that several people approached him to report similar issues. "This is a problem happening with Christian ministries," he said. "This is a problem happening with other Christian content, other Christian companies."

He pointed to artificial intelligence as a driving factor behind what he sees as systemic bias. "Google's algorithm views the Christian worldview as problematic and as dangerous and harmful," Dusing said. He warned that as AI systems make more moderation decisions, Christians could face broader digital exclusion. "As Google's AI becomes more powerful and makes more decisions, it's a threat to Christians everywhere," he said, suggesting potential consequences could include pastors being banned or churches having funding blocked.

When asked whether the companies offered a path forward, Dusing said TikTok has been largely unresponsive and difficult to engage beyond automated systems. Regarding Google, he said the company indicated it would not revise its policy. "This is an intentional choice that they've made against a Christian product trying to really promote positivity and well-being for children," he said.

Dusing described the issue as more than a business dispute, framing it as a question of religious freedom in the digital age. As artificial intelligence becomes increasingly central to online platforms, he argued that decisions about what ideas are deemed acceptable could shape the future of public faith expression.

For Christian families seeking alternatives to mainstream entertainment, Dusing maintains that Truplay will continue its mission despite the resistance. "Everything that True Play has inside it has a biblical foundation to it," he said, emphasizing that the company's focus remains on building faith and character in the next generation.

FAA Grounds All Flights in El Paso After Cartel Drones Breach US Airspace

The Federal Aviation Administration temporarily grounded all flights to and from El Paso International Airport, citing “special security reasons” and warning that the U.S. government “may use deadly force” against any aircraft in violation of the restriction.

The closure, as reported by Fox Business, applied to commercial, cargo and general aviation flights and was initially scheduled to run from Feb. 10 at 11:30 p.m. MST through Feb. 20 at 11:30 p.m. MST. El Paso International Airport confirmed the shutdown in a statement, telling travelers, “Travelers should contact their airlines to get the most up-to-date flight status information.”

The sudden restriction and the reference to possible deadly force triggered a wave of speculation online. Social media users floated theories ranging from UFO or UAP sightings to a major national security incident unfolding along the southern border. With few immediate details from federal officials, rumors spread rapidly, fueling heightened concern.

Former FAA safety team member Kyle Bailey told Fox News that a 10-day restriction of that scale would have been “unprecedented.” He pointed to the airport’s proximity to Fort Bliss Army post and speculated it appeared to be “something like a national security event, a high-level VIP,” while also noting that “on the Mexican side of the border there is no flight restriction.”

Federal officials later clarified the situation. A Trump administration official told Fox News the lockdown came in response to “Mexican cartel drones” that breached U.S. airspace.

“Mexican cartel drones breached U.S. airspace. The Department of War took action to disable the drones. The FAA and DOW have determined there is no threat to commercial travel,” the official said.

After the drones were disabled, the FAA lifted the restriction, stating there was no ongoing threat. What began as a mysterious shutdown that sparked intense online speculation was ultimately attributed to a cross-border drone incursion that officials said has now been neutralized.

Tucker Carlson’s Interview on Christians in Israel Leaves

Out Key Facts

Scripture makes clear that spiritual battles can extend beyond a single generation. Exodus 20:5 warns of iniquity visiting “the children unto the third and fourth generation,” while Galatians 3:13 declares that Christ redeems believers from the curse of the law. Throughout the Bible covenant language is central. Blessings flow through obedience to God’s covenant and bondage follows agreements outside of it. Generational curses, spiritual strongholds and open doors are realities addressed in Scripture and confronted through repentance and deliverance.

Dr. LaTanya Moore says she confronted that reality in her own life.

A Vision on the Sea of Galilee

Moore was a member of Delta Sigma Theta for nearly 20 years. She described the experience as “fun” and active, involving social events and community service. But everything shifted during a trip to Israel.

While sitting in a boat on the Sea of Galilee, she asked God what storm He was calming in her life.

“I said, ‘God, what storm are you calming in my life?’”

She said the Lord responded through a vision.

“The Lord normally speaks to me through vision. I began to have a vision of my grandfather.”

In the vision she saw her deceased grandfather wearing a hat marked with a symbol. She said the Lord revealed that the symbol “had allowed negative spirits to come into our family bloodline.”

God then showed her her mother and finally herself.

“When I saw myself, I was kneeling down on my knees. I was looking up at a symbol. And the Lord showed me that that was my open door.”

She said her grandfather’s and mother’s doors were closed but hers remained open.

“It was as if God was giving me a choice to close that door.”

Covenants and Deities

Moore concluded that her sorority membership represented a spiritual covenant that conflicted with her covenant with God.

“We’re only supposed to worship one God, the true and living God,” she said.

She stated that every historically Black Greek organization has a deity and said Delta’s is the Roman goddess Minerva, likened to Athena.

“Most people say, ‘Well, I didn’t bow to a Greek god.’ However, the moment that you took that oath, you did so to a Greek god.”

She described initiation ceremonies involving bowing at an altar, kneeling on a white pillow and reciting oaths.

“There are candles lit. There’s an altar that is set up. Most organizations bow. You put a pillow under your knees and you bow so that you can actually say the oath and sign your name.”

She said many pledges are teenagers who are “basically signing your name on a dotted line without knowing the terms and conditions.”

Curses” on !

Breaking the Covenant

Moore said the Lord showed her what her future could look like if she closed the door.

“You can choose to continue to be a part of this organization and keep this door open or you can close that door and receive what I have for you.”

She formally removed her name from membership, comparing it to divorce.

“If I really wanted to be out of that covenant, I had to release it by removing my name from the roll.”

She described the decision as deliverance.

“There were open doors that gave the enemy access to have his way in your bloodline. And because that door was open, now that you’ve closed it, it brings about deliverance.”

Supernatural Healing and Bloodline Cleansing

Moore said the spiritual shift produced immediate results.

“I had a lump in my breast that was supernaturally healed.”

She also described what she called the removal of spiritual limitations.

“When I took the letters off, God took the limits off.”

According to Moore, the Lord told her He was cleansing her bloodline.

“Things run in your family until they run into you,” she said.

“And it’s time for us to begin to confront the things that confronted our bloodlines.”

She said patterns such as poverty, anger, lust and other struggles must be confronted through repentance and renunciation.

A Call to Deliverance

Moore initially renounced privately but later felt directed to make her decision public.

“This isn’t about denouncing. This is deliverance,” she said.

Today she leads a prophetic and deliverance ministry focused on helping others break spiritual chains and ungodly covenants.

“When we repent, when we renounce and we remove those things from our lives, we’re going to see a whole new level of increase from what God wants to do.”

Deliverance is not a fringe doctrine but a biblical mandate. Jesus cast out demons, broke spiritual oppression and gave His followers authority to do the same. Scripture makes clear that believers are called to renounce darkness, tear down spiritual strongholds and walk fully in the freedom Christ purchased at the cross.

For Moore, closing the door was not symbolic. It was obedience. And in a spiritual battle that Scripture says is “not against flesh and blood,” obedience is where true freedom begins.
