

Suicide Pods for Couples Signal the West's Full Embrace of a Culture of Death

The euthanasia movement continues to advance across the Western world, and its latest innovation reveals just how far society has drifted from the sanctity of life established by God (Gen. 1:27; Deut. 30:19).

For years, we at Charisma Media have reported on the steady normalization of assisted suicide, particularly in nations such as Canada, where state-sanctioned death has expanded beyond the terminally ill and now includes those suffering from mental illness, disability and despair. What was once unthinkable is now marketed as compassion (Isa. 5:20).

A recent Daily Mail report exposes the newest frontier of this movement: a so-called "suicide pod for couples," a device designed to allow two people to end their lives together in a single chamber.

The device, known as the "Double Dutch" Sarco pod, is the latest creation of euthanasia activist Philip Nitschke. The pod is engineered so that "if they both want to die, they have to die together," requiring two people to press activation buttons simultaneously before nitrogen floods the capsule.

This is not love. It is a grotesque imitation of covenant (Gen. 2:24; Eph. 5:25–32).

Marriage, according to Scripture, is a reflection of Christ and the church, rooted in sacrificial love, endurance and faithfulness through suffering (Eph. 5:25–27). The Sarco pod instead presents death as intimacy and self-destruction as devotion. What God designed to point humanity toward life eternal is being rebranded as a shared exit from existence (John 10:10).

Order Amanda Grace's New Book, "Brace For Impact" on !

Nitschke told the Daily Mail that feedback from potential users led him to develop the dual pod because dying alone felt "so lonely," adding that some said, "I want to be held by someone when I die." The solution, in his view, was not hope, community or spiritual care, but synchronized death (Gal. 6:2; Rom. 15:1).

Even more troubling is the incorporation of artificial intelligence to determine mental capacity. Under the new system, users will no longer undergo traditional psychiatric evaluations. Instead, they will complete an AI-based assessment with an avatar. If they pass, the machine is activated for 24 hours, during which they may enter the pod and end their lives.

This automation of death represents a chilling abdication of moral responsibility. Human life, once recognized as sacred, is now subjected to software approval (Prov. 14:12).

While Switzerland's permissive laws make it the only country where such a device could currently be used, the cultural momentum behind euthanasia is unmistakable. Canada's experience shows how quickly "medical aid in dying" expands once society accepts the lie that some lives are no longer worth living (Gen. 9:6).

Scripture teaches the opposite.

Life is not a burden to be discarded when suffering arises. It is a divine gift. Even in a fallen world marked by pain, God remains the author of life and death (Job 1:21; Deut. 32:39). Everlasting life is not found through nitrogen gas or mechanical capsules, but through Jesus Christ, who conquered death itself (Rom. 6:23; 1 Cor. 15:54–57).

The rise of devices like the Double Dutch Sarco is not merely a medical or legal issue. It is a spiritual one. It reflects a civilization that has abandoned God's ways and replaced them with autonomy, convenience and despair (Judg. 21:25).

When a society rejects the Giver of life, death becomes its solution (Rom. 1:21–25).

And when death is celebrated as freedom, it is no longer compassion that guides culture, but deception (2 Thess. 2:10).

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

The Bible Reveals a Timeline for Jesus' Return and a Warning for the Unprepared

More than 50 years ago, famed pastor and evangelist David Wilkerson shared what he described as a terrifying vision from the Lord about the future of America and the world.

First revealed publicly in the early 1970s, the vision was widely dismissed at the time as extreme and implausible. Yet decades later, many of Wilkerson's warnings appear strikingly aligned with present-day realities, from moral collapse and economic instability to cultural hostility toward biblical Christianity.

Wilkerson said the vision came with an “awesome sense of calamity” and centered on five major judgments he believed were approaching as a result of rampant sin and spiritual rebellion.

1. A Worldwide Economic Collapse

Wilkerson warned of a coming global recession driven by economic confusion that would affect “the lifestyle of every wage earner in the world.”

“I saw at most a few more fat flourishing years and then an economic recession,” he said, adding that world economists would be “at a loss to explain what’s happening.”

He foresaw major corporations going bankrupt, churches facing financial collapse and missionary projects floundering. Wilkerson urged believers to use the remaining years of prosperity wisely.

“One of the clearest messages I’ve ever received from God in my life is this: Use the next few good years left to prepare for financial crises. Get your house in order because hard times are coming,” he said.

2. Natural Disasters as ‘Labor Pains’

Wilkerson described nature itself entering what he called “labor pains,” marked by disasters that would increase in both frequency and intensity.

“I saw major earthquakes coming to the United States,” he said. “I saw worldwide famine... with millions starving.”

He also spoke of extreme weather, cosmic disturbances and global instability so severe that humanity would be forced to admit the world was under “supernatural siege.”

“These are labor pains,” Wilkerson said, warning they would intensify as the world drew closer to the establishment of God’s kingdom.

Order Amanda Grace’s New Book, “Brace For Impact” on !

3. A Flood of Filth and Moral Collapse

One of Wilkerson’s most detailed warnings involved what he called a “flood of filth” overtaking American culture, particularly through media.

“I see the prophecy of Nahum coming to pass,” he said. “God said, ‘I’ll pour abominable filth upon you.’”

Wilkerson predicted the normalization of explicit sexual content on television, the collapse of moral standards and the celebration of what was once considered obscene. He said restraint would be removed as society demanded immorality.

“Men are clamoring for nudity, streaking filth, dirty television programming – and they’re going to get it,” he said.

He warned that even children would be exposed to sexually explicit material under the guise of education, and that the culture would reach a point where older forms of obscenity would seem tame by comparison.

4. A Persecution Madness Against True Believers

Wilkerson said genuine, Spirit-filled Christians would face growing persecution worldwide, beginning subtly during a time of apparent religious freedom.

“I see now persecution coming such as mankind has never before witnessed,” he said.

Citing Jesus' words in John 15 and Paul's warning in 2 Timothy 3:12, Wilkerson said persecution would serve to separate true believers from false ones.

"This persecution will rise like a many-headed monster," he said, adding that it would involve government pressure, harassment of ministries and restrictions on Christian media.

"I see a time coming when nearly all evangelical missionary projects... will be so closely monitored, questioned and badgered by government agencies they'll be cautious about moving or expanding in any direction," he said.

5. The Rise of a 'Super World Church'

Wilkerson warned of a powerful global religious system he described as a "super world church," formed through alliances between liberal Protestant groups and the Roman Catholic Church.

"This visible super world church is going to be spiritual in name only," he said. "It will freely use the name of Jesus Christ but will in fact be anti-Christ and political."

He said the movement would begin through charitable cooperation but evolve into a political force that would marginalize biblical Christianity. Wilkerson also warned of moral compromise within this system, including the affirmation of homosexuality, the ordination of openly gay clergy and the infiltration of occult practices.

"I see homosexual and lesbian ministers... heralded as a new breed of pioneer evangelists," he said, adding that churches would increasingly replace prayer with spiritual counterfeits.

Wilkerson acknowledged that sharing the vision cost him friendships and credibility at the time. Even he admitted to moments of doubt, wondering whether he had simply imagined it. Yet more than five decades later, the accuracy of many of his warnings has caused renewed interest in the vision.

Despite the sobering nature of his message, Wilkerson ended on a hopeful note, insisting that God remains entirely in control.

“No matter how things look in this drunken world, all things are still working together for good to everyone who loves God,” he said. “Look up and rejoice.”

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

World Banks Are Preparing for Alien Disclosure. Christians Should Pay Attention

For years, talk of UFOs, aliens and non-human intelligence was treated as the domain of cranks and late-night radio hosts. That excuse no longer holds.

When central banks, military intelligence agencies, heads of state and even the Vatican begin openly discussing the implications of disclosure, something has shifted. What was once dismissed as nonsense is now quietly being planned at the highest levels of global power.

And far too many people, especially Christians, are still shrugging it off.

A recent report from The Times of London revealed that a former Bank of England analyst is urging financial authorities to prepare for the fallout of an official announcement confirming the existence of non-human intelligence. The concern is not theoretical. It is immediate, systemic and destabilizing.

“If there is an official announcement and we get presented with very clear evidence that nobody is going to dispute, I would say that in a matter of hours, you are going to have total financial instability,” said Helen McCaw, a former senior analyst in financial security at the Bank of England.

She warned of bank failures, payment system collapse and civil unrest.

“If banks start failing, the payment system will collapse, and you’ll have rioting on the streets because people can’t fill their cars up with fuel or buy food in the supermarket,” McCaw said.

This is not a blogger speculating. This is a former central bank analyst warning that disclosure could unravel modern society within hours.

This Is Not New to Everyone

For Christian researcher and author L.A. Marzulli, none of this is surprising.

Marzulli has warned for years that the UFO and UAP phenomenon is not about little green men from distant galaxies, but something far more ancient, deceptive and spiritual in nature.

“UFOs are not evidence of friendly ‘space brothers’ but rather interdimensional beings with a very nefarious, dark agenda,” Marzulli has said in previous interviews with Charisma Media.

“This narrative is designed to deceive, even the elect, if that were possible.”

That warning sounds uncomfortable to modern ears, especially in a culture trained to separate faith from geopolitics, finance and technology. But the convergence now happening should make that separation impossible to maintain.

Governments are no longer mocking the topic. Militaries are no longer denying it. Financial institutions are planning for it. Religious authorities are preparing theological responses.

Only the public and much of the church seem determined to stay asleep.

A Spiritual Issue With Material Consequences

Marzulli has consistently framed disclosure not as a scientific breakthrough, but as a spiritual confrontation with real-world consequences.

“These aren’t your average fallen angels,” he says. “These are principalities, entities in charge of entire areas, and they have a very specific agenda to deceive.”

That deception, he argues, will not arrive wearing horns and pitchforks. It will arrive with credentials, authority and explanations that seem reasonable in a shaken world looking for answers.

And people will be looking for answers.

McCaw warned that disclosure could collapse confidence in markets, currencies and governments overnight.

“There might be extreme price volatility in financial markets due to catastrophizing or euphoria, and a collapse in confidence if market participants feel uncertain on how to price assets using any of the familiar methods,” she said.

When trust evaporates, people search for meaning, stability and leadership. The danger, Marzulli says, is where they will look.

“This narrative is designed to deceive,” he has warned repeatedly, pointing Christians back to Scripture rather than spectacle.

From Fringe to Front Page

British military documents now acknowledge efforts to obtain “extraterrestrial” technology. Senior U.S. officials have admitted unexplained craft operate beyond known human capabilities. Even the Vatican has publicly stated that discovering non-human intelligence would not contradict Catholic theology.

This is no longer fringe. It is institutional.

Marzulli describes modern disclosure as a slow climb that conditions the public step by step.

“That’s a major rung on the ladder,” he said, referring to recent government acknowledgments. “But we haven’t moved up much further yet.”

The implication is clear. More is coming.

Ignoring This Will Not Make It Go Away

Whether one agrees with Marzulli’s conclusions or not, dismissing the issue outright is no longer intellectually or spiritually responsible. When global banks prepare for chaos, governments prepare narratives, and religious institutions prepare doctrine, pretending nothing is happening is not discernment. It is denial.

Marzulli has been blunt about where he believes this leads.

“This is the coming great deception,” he has said.

The question is not whether disclosure is coming. The question is whether people, especially Christians, will be grounded enough in truth to recognize deception when it arrives dressed as enlightenment.

The world is preparing. Silence and mockery are no longer options.

Pay attention.

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

Did a Demon Manifest When the Name of Jesus Was Spoken on BBC Live Television?

A growing hunger for spiritual clarity, biblical preaching and authentic worship is drawing thousands to a south Atlanta church each week, according to a recent segment on Erin Burnett OutFront. The report highlights the rapid rise of 2819 Church, led by Pastor Philip Anthony Mitchell, whose sermons are prompting people to travel across state lines and line up before dawn just to attend Sunday services.

The CNN report opens inside the sanctuary, where Mitchell's preaching centers on perseverance, faith and gratitude in the face of hardship.

"Doctor's report? Still standing. Betrayal? Still standing. Lost a job? Still standing. Is anybody happy that you're still standing? Give God praise," Mitchell declared from the pulpit.

The segment, reported by Ryan Young, documents worshipers arriving hours early, some driving through the night from states like Ohio and North Carolina. Many told CNN they wait in line not out of hype, but because they believe something spiritually significant is taking place.

Mitchell acknowledged modern culture's distractions while reframing the purpose of prayer and faith.

"Since we're in America and I know we're mad, materialistic, wanting to hear Pastor Philip Anthony Mitchell. The greatest reward you'll get in prayer is not something you can touch," he said.

The church's name is rooted directly in Scripture. Mitchell told the network, "2819 was taken from a scripture, Matthew 28:19 and that scripture Matthew records what's called the great commission."

That biblical foundation is fueling something far bigger than a local church movement.

"I think it's a revival that's happening in America through 2819 and around the world. People are coming in here, and they're finding a message of hope. They're being encouraged," he said.

Order Amanda Grace's New Book, "Brace For Impact" on !

Mitchell also referenced personal and spiritual trials the church has endured.

"The devil took his best shot last year, but [we're] still standing, though," he said.

Rather than cultivating exclusivity, Mitchell said the goal is accessibility.

"We want to create an atmosphere that's not so stuffy that anybody can come from any walk of life and feel comfortable," he said.

Throughout the service, Mitchell repeatedly invited congregants to respond publicly to what God has done in their lives.

"Does anybody got that kind of testimony? All right. You give Him praise in this house," he said.

CNN's report also highlights Mitchell's emphasis on spiritual urgency, including moments he described outside the pulpit.

"Three a.m., 3:00 a.m. there, I am weeping on the floor as I'm hearing this warning of God that time is coming to an end," Mitchell said.

Rejecting shallow motivational preaching, Mitchell told the crowd, "This ain't no pep talk, this real life. Come on, put your hands together and give Him praise."

As attendance has swelled from roughly 200 people to about 6,000 each Sunday, Mitchell acknowledged the visible crowds are only part of the story.

“Yes, people do stand in line for hours to get into these gatherings, but something is happening on the inside that’s making them... want to be out there. I do feel overwhelmed at the amount of people,” he said.

He added, “But all of the things that we are busying ourselves with –”

The CNN segment also explored Mitchell’s personal testimony, including his conversion after a life-altering moment in 2003.

“I knew I was different; my heart was different. Something changed in my heart, and for the first time, I felt bad about the wrong that I was doing. So, God literally met me in that bathroom, Nov. 2003. And that day changed the whole trajectory of my life,” Mitchell said.

Mitchell also addressed the church’s rapidly expanding digital audience.

“To all of our digital disciples watching live right now across America and around the world, you are our family,” he said.

With more than 72 million YouTube views across over 50 countries, the message of 2819 Church is now reaching far beyond Atlanta. Mitchell said the response reflects a deeper reality in the world today.

“Whether we’re young or old, black, white, brown, we all can agree that we live in a world that is broken when we see violent weather patterns, we see wars, we see crime, murders, lawlessness,” he said.

For Mitchell, the guiding principle behind the church’s growth remains simple and unwavering.

“I want to be faithful to whatever the Bible says,” he said.

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

Pastor Warns Acclaimed Film 'Sinners' Carries Spiritual Danger Despite Golden Globes Success

A subtle but devastating lie has crept into much of modern Christianity, the idea that believers are meant to survive spiritual opposition rather than confront it. That lie produces timid prayers, defensive faith, and Christians who live as though spiritual resistance is something to endure rather than something to defeat.

In a recent clip from The Deep End w/Taylor Welch, Taylor Welch dismantles that mindset entirely, calling believers back to a biblical understanding of authority, dominion and offensive spiritual warfare.

"What happens when a believer gets convinced of their authority in what God is wanting to do?" Welch asks. "They begin to understand that it is actually offensive that the kingdom of darkness thought that they could do something to violate God's supreme plan."

That framing changes everything. Spiritual resistance is no longer something that causes fear or retreat. It is an act of defiance against God Himself, and it demands a response.

Saved to Be Used, Not to Hide

Welch confronts a version of Christianity that stops at personal salvation but never advances into purpose.

“It’s no longer I’m just like, ‘Dude, woe is me, like saved by the blood of Jesus,’” he says. “The Lord saved me so that He could use me.”

That distinction is critical. Salvation is not an endpoint. It is an authorization. Scripture is clear that believers are seated with Christ and empowered by Him, yet many live as though redemption merely grants them shelter rather than assignment.

Welch challenges that passivity head-on.

“I’m beginning to send the blood of Jesus into situations where they cannot survive contact.”

That is not poetic language. It is a declaration of warfare.

Order Your Copy of the Spiritual Warfare Bible on !

Offensive Warfare, Not Spiritual Self-Defense

One of the most striking aspects of Welch’s message is his rejection of defensive Christianity.

“Offensive warfare, not defensive,” he says plainly. “The Christian has got to stop trying to defend themselves from every little fly that’s floating around.”

Too often, Christians are consumed with protection prayers, constantly reacting to pressure instead of advancing God's will. Welch argues that this posture misunderstands both authority and responsibility.

"If there is something that God is asking me to do and there's an obstruction," he says, "Lord, please send the blood of Jesus into that situation so that any spiritual villain, enemy or thief would begin to die."

This is not fear-driven prayer. It is dominion-driven prayer.

No Mercy for What Defies God

Welch's language becomes even more direct when addressing spiritual opposition.

"Rip their plans apart," he declares. "Do not let them breathe anymore because they thought that they were bold enough and haughty enough to mock the Lord of Hosts."

That statement alone shatters the modern tendency to soften spiritual warfare into vague encouragement. The Bible does not portray evil as something to negotiate with. It portrays it as something to be cast down, driven out and destroyed.

Welch continues, "Don't let them function. Don't let them survive this. Close the doors and lock them so that they must see how they have messed up."

This is not cruelty. It is alignment with God's justice and sovereignty.

David Didn't Ask. He Acted.

Welch turns to David as a biblical example, rejecting the idea that faith is passive trust without confrontation.

"David is not like, 'The Lord is my shepherd and so whatever He wants to have happen happens,'" Welch says. "No, he goes,

'No, this is the Lord's. You've made a mistake. You've crossed the line.'"

David did not plead. He declared.

"You have defied the plans of God," Welch continues, paraphrasing David's posture. "Therefore, I will cut your head off."

That is biblical faith in action, bold, decisive and unafraid of confrontation.

Stop Begging. Start Warring.

Welch's final challenge leaves no room for ambiguity.

"Stop begging God to save you," he says. "Learn how to memorize Scripture. Learn how to come into your place as a chosen son or daughter and begin to do warfare."

This is the conclusion every believer must face. Either Christianity is a powerless belief system meant to comfort us until heaven, or it is a kingdom mandate that authorizes believers to confront darkness here and now.

Welch makes his position clear. Believers do have authority over the devil and his minions, and the time for timid faith is over.

The enemy is not confused about his role. The only question left is whether the church will finally understand hers.

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

Tim Tebow Reveals How God Radically Changed His Life's Mission

Former NFL quarterback Tim Tebow recently brought a message of biblical hope and purpose into mainstream culture during an appearance on Andrew Schulz's 'Flagrant with Akaash Singh' in Nov. 2025.

Tebow recently posted a clip of speaking with comedian Schulz and co-host Akaash Singh, in which he addressed some of life's most pressing questions, including suffering, meaning and the role faith plays in a fractured world. His answers consistently pointed back to Scripture as the ultimate source of truth and direction.