

Ancient Bible's End Times Timeline Is Going Viral Online

There is something captivating about old Bibles. The thick paper, the worn edges and the extra charts tucked into the front feel like a window into how earlier generations tried to understand history and time. That is why a recently resurfaced Bible timeline has captured so much attention online. It is interesting. It sparks curiosity. It invites reflection. But it should never be confused with Scripture or treated as a countdown to the end.

A recent Daily Mail article highlights a viral video posted on Instagram by Kaylah Hodgins, who drew attention to an 1818 Bible containing detailed chronological tables alongside apocryphal writings.

According to Hodgins video, the Bible lists "3,974 years from Adam to Christ, plus another 1,815 years from Christ's birth to the Bible's publication year," totaling 5,789 years by the early 19th century. When the years since printing are added, the timeline approaches 6,000 years since Creation, a number that has long carried symbolic meaning in some Jewish and Christian traditions.

Less than two months later, Maduro was captured and deposed in a U.S. military operation. While we do not regard this man as a true prophet (his extravagant claims about himself make that clear), elements of his prophecy over Venezuela may yet prove accurate, just not as he or Maduro intended.

David Edward Owuor, the wealthy Kenyan founder of Repentance and Holiness Ministry, has long made bold assertions: that he is the greatest prophet ever, that he is Elijah, and even that he embodies both of the two witnesses in Revelation 11. These claims rightly undermine his credibility as a genuine prophet of God.

Order Jonathan Cahn's Newest Book, "The Avatar" on !

Yet Owuor visited Miraflores Palace, met with Maduro, and prayed fervently over him amid growing U.S. pressure on the regime. In a video from his ministry channels, Owuor decreed protection, strength and triumph.

Here is the full quote of his prayer:

I want to pray for the president of this country, in the powerful name of Jesus. And I am saying this very aware that this is a special nation, and that the Lord is with this country. And let me lay my hand upon you and make a decree, Father, in the powerful name of Jesus.

Lord, I decree with my prophetic tongue today, that you protect the president of this nation, and protect the entire land of Venezuela, even as you have shown me in a dream, you will cast out the enemy. The enemy will not come near, and this nation will rise. I decree health and strength upon the president of this land, Nicolas Maduro, so that in this land, Lord, you will always be glorified.

Lord, I decree today that as this nation rises, the name of Jesus will be exalted in this land. I have decreed today victory, victory, victory: victory three times in the mighty name of Jesus.

On Jan. 3, 2026, Maduro and his wife were captured in a U.S. operation and flown to face federal charges. With the dictator removed, Venezuela now has a real opportunity for recovery. The “enemy” cast out could well refer to Maduro’s corrupt regime itself. A freer nation may see economic renewal, genuine revival, and greater opportunity for the gospel to flourish, something severely restricted under his rule. The name of Jesus could indeed be exalted in new ways.

Owuor clearly intended his prayer to bolster Maduro’s position, aligning himself with a repressive government. Neither he nor Maduro would have wanted this outcome. Yet the Lord often works in mysterious ways, and Venezuela’s future may reflect the prophecy's words more closely than anyone expected, through the very downfall both men sought to prevent.

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

Is the US Dollar in Trouble? A Prophetic Warning About What's Coming

There is a single line tucked into the Old Testament that feels easy to read past until you really stop and think about it. Solomon's Temple, one of the most ambitious construction projects in ancient history, was built without the sound of a hammer, axe or iron tool at the site. The stones arrived already cut. Already shaped. Already perfect.

That detail alone is strange enough. But once you start asking how, things get weird fast.

That is exactly where Josh Hooper, Andy DeNoon and Lily Hooper take listeners in a recent episode of the Ninjas Are Butterflies. What begins as a casual Bible observation quickly spirals into one of the strangest conspiracies tied to a biblical event most people think they already understand.

Hooper points straight to the verse in 1 Kings 6:7. No iron tools on the Temple Mount. None. Not during construction. Not even the sound of them. The stones were shaped elsewhere using a method the Bible never explains.

That silence is where the conspiracy lives.

To fill the gap, the hosts turn to Jewish tradition, specifically stories preserved in the Talmud. They are careful to flag this as extra-biblical material, written long after the events of Scripture and not authoritative for Christians. Still, it is the place where ancient Jewish thinkers tried to answer the same question modern readers ask today.

Their answer? Something called the Shamir.

Order Jonathan Cahn's Newest Book, "The Avatar" on !

According to those traditions, Solomon didn't rely on chisels or blades. He used a mysterious object or entity capable of cutting stone without touching it. The descriptions sound less like craftsmanship and more like science fiction. A green ray that splits rock effortlessly. A force that causes stone to part the way a flower opens. Sometimes it is described as a worm-like creature. Other times as a stone. Other times as something closer to raw energy.

Lily notes how quickly the language moves from practical to supernatural. Whatever the Shamir was supposed to be, it did not behave like a tool. It behaved like a power.

In the Talmudic account, Solomon is forbidden from using iron because it is associated with warfare and bloodshed. God's house, the tradition says, should not be built with instruments of death. That leaves Solomon with an impossible problem until he is told the Shamir exists and can be obtained from Ashmedai, a figure described as a king of demons. Or perhaps better known as a principality (rulers of darkness, etc.)

According to the story, Ashmedai is captured through deception, questioned and forced to reveal the Shamir's location. It turns out the Shamir is guarded by a mythical bird, described as a rooster-like mountain creature that uses the Shamir to cut stone for its nest. Solomon's men trick the bird, steal the Shamir and use it to build the Temple without iron.

If this sounds like a fever dream, that is part of the appeal. The hosts are not presenting this as hidden Scripture. They are walking listeners through an ancient conspiracy that sits alongside the biblical text, not inside it.

They then connect the Shamir legend to ancient stone structures around the world. Massive blocks in Peru and elsewhere fit together so precisely that they look melted into place. Some tunnels appear glassy, as if they had been exposed to intense heat. In many cases, the building techniques appear suddenly in history and then vanish just as suddenly.

What if ancient civilizations had access to something we no longer understand? What if the Shamir story is a distorted memory of a lost technology? The tradition that the Shamir could only be contained in lead adds fuel to the fire, since lead is used today to shield radiation. That detail alone has led some to speculate about energy-based tools or forces far beyond primitive assumptions about the ancient world.

The story gets even stranger. Some Jewish traditions claim that the Shamir existed before Adam and Eve, alongside objects such as Moses' staff. In that framework, the Shamir is not an invention at all. It is a relic of creation itself, later handled by beings both divine and rebellious.

At this point, the hosts do something important. They slow down.

None of this, they stress, comes from the Bible. These are not scriptural accounts. They are traditions, legends and speculative explanations layered around a real biblical event. And that distinction matters. Scripture stands on its own, and the Bible explicitly instructs believers to test everything rather than accept claims uncritically.

But there is also room for wonder. The Bible is not shy about the supernatural. It records miracles, divine interventions and events that defy natural explanation. Exploring wild traditions like the Shamir does not rewrite our faith. It simply reminds us that history may be stranger than modern categories allow.

This is a conspiracy wrapped in biblical history, not because it replaces Scripture, but because it orbits it. A reminder that one unexplained verse can open the door to centuries of speculation, myth and unanswered questions.

Whether the Shamir was fiction, metaphor or something else entirely, the fact that people have been trying to explain Solomon's Temple for thousands of years says something profound.

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

2.5 Million People Witness Jesus Fill the Sky in Record-Setting Display

A record-breaking New Year's Eve celebration in Rio de Janeiro placed Jesus Christ at the center of the world's largest countdown, offering a striking and uplifting start to the year.

According to The Gateway Pundit, drones formed the image of Christ the Redeemer emerging from the Atlantic Ocean before an estimated 2.5 million people gathered along Copacabana Beach. The moment drew cheers from the massive crowd as fireworks illuminated the shoreline.

Christ the Redeemer emerging from the sea by drones on New Year's Eve 2026 in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. □□□□

– sacredchad (@sacredchad_ig) January 2, 2026

The scale of the event was formally recognized by Guinness World Records. "Rio's New Year's Eve celebration has been officially recognized by Guinness World Records as the Biggest New Year's Eve Celebration in the World," the organization stated, citing "the projected 2.5 million people on Copacabana Beach in 2025."

The Gateway Pundit noted that despite Rio's natural beauty, the city is often highlighted internationally only during moments of crisis or corruption. Large tourism-driven events remain the exception. "The nice exception are the mega events that take place in this city that is designed for tourism," the article said, pointing to major global gatherings that briefly reshape Rio's image.

Order Jonathan Cahn's Newest Book, "The Avatar" on !

This year's focal point stood apart. The display involved "1,200 drones, synchronized with fireworks and a special soundtrack by DJ Alok," blending modern technology with one of the most recognizable symbols of the Christian faith.

Rather than centering the celebration on celebrity culture or abstract imagery, the world's largest New Year's Eve gathering openly elevated Jesus Christ before millions of attendees and viewers worldwide. The moment carried a clarity that resonated far beyond the shoreline.

As the new year began under the image of Christ rising above the sea, the question lingers: what better way to welcome the year ahead than by honoring our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ?

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.

Jaw-Dropping Moment as Live Jesus Portrait Sells for $2.75 Million

In a recent podcast interview, Pastor Vlad Savchuk of HungryGen Ministries and deliverance minister Rikhard Hartikainen examined the concept of soul ties, presenting them as powerful relational bonds that can either strengthen a person's life or become a lasting source of spiritual and emotional bondage.

The discussion begins with a clear distinction between healthy and unhealthy soul ties. Soul ties, as they explain, are part of God's design for human relationships and are meant to function within defined boundaries. Marriage, family relationships, and close friendships represent healthy expressions of these bonds, fostering trust, stability, and emotional security.

Disorder enters when soul ties form outside that design. Sexual relationships outside marriage are identified as one of the primary ways unhealthy soul ties are created. In those cases, emotional and spiritual bonds form without covenantal protection. When the relationship ends, the bond does not simply disappear. Attachment lingers, often producing confusion, emotional conflict and continued vulnerability.

Soul ties are not limited to sexual relationships. Deep emotional bonds forged in toxic or abusive environments can have the same binding effect. Relationships marked by manipulation, control, betrayal or domination create attachments that persist even after physical separation, continuing to influence thoughts, emotions, and behavior.

Order Vlad Savchuk's New Book, "Make the Devil Homeless" on !

These unhealthy bonds are also presented as gateways for spiritual oppression. A soul tie does not have to be inherently demonic to become dangerous. Once formed, it provides ongoing access, allowing torment to persist, particularly when the other individual involved carries destructive spiritual patterns or unresolved issues.

Personal history plays a significant role in how soul ties develop. Those raised in unstable or emotionally absent homes often bond quickly in search of validation or security. Others, shaped by emotionally distant environments, struggle to form deep connections at all, including within marriage. These relational patterns tend to carry into adulthood, shaping how attachments are formed and maintained.

The discussion expands beyond romantic relationships to include spiritual environments. Unhealthy soul ties can form between leaders and followers when authority replaces accountability. In extreme cases, this dynamic produces dependence and control rather than healthy discipleship, laying the groundwork for manipulation.

Freedom from unhealthy soul ties requires deliberate action. The process centers on repentance for sin, forgiveness toward those who caused harm, and intentional renunciation of the bond itself. Identifying specific relationships during prayer is described as a practical way to bring clarity and finality, not as a ritual with inherent power.

Fear-driven responses, particularly within marriage, are firmly rejected. A believer married to an unbeliever is not instructed to violate the marital covenant out of spiritual anxiety. Obedience to God's design for marriage is framed as protection, not exposure.

Not every struggle traces back to a soul tie, and not every emotional wound has a spiritual root. When deep bonds form outside proper boundaries, those connections remain active until they are addressed.

Soul ties, as described by the ministry leaders, help explain why some relationships are difficult to let go of and why healing often does not come with time alone. Freedom requires acknowledging the bond, confronting it honestly and restoring order where it was broken.

To listen to the full interview, watch the video above.

*James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.*

Roman-Era Discovery in Revelation's Ephesus Draws Global Attention

Archaeologists have uncovered unexpected Roman-era artifacts in Ephesus, a city deeply rooted in early Christian history and named as one of the seven churches in the book of Revelation.

The discoveries were announced Dec. 12 by Anadolu Agency, Fox News reports. As excavations along the city's ancient Stadium Street revealed a rare first-century marble bathtub and a fragmented Roman statue, both offering new insight into daily life during the era of the early church.

The marble bathtub, carved from Greco Scritto marble and measuring nearly five feet long, dates back to the first century A.D. Archaeologist Serdar Aybek said the find stood out because it was intended for private use rather than a public bath complex.

Order James Lasher's New Book, "The Revelation of Jesus" on !

"It is an unusual discovery because it is not something we encounter frequently," Aybek said.

"We believe it belonged to the Terrace Houses and was used in the first century A.D.," he added. "We found it during work at the theater, and its size shows it was used in a house."

After its original use by a wealthy Roman household, the bathtub was later repurposed as a fountain trough, reflecting how structures and objects were reused as the city evolved.

Archaeologists also uncovered a fragment of a male statue, dated between the first century B.C. and first century A.D., which had been dismantled and reused as a paving stone. Aybek described the discovery as "completely unexpected."

The finds are the latest in a growing list of discoveries across Asia Minor tied to early Christianity and the Roman world. In recent months, a 1,500-year-old Christian floor mosaic was unearthed in Urfa, traditionally regarded as the birthplace of Abraham. Meanwhile, archaeologists in Laodicea, another city named in Revelation, uncovered the remains of a massive Roman council hall.

Taken together, the steady stream of discoveries in biblically significant locations is drawing worldwide attention. For many observers, the timing is striking. Cities mentioned in Scripture are once again at the center of global focus, their buried histories resurfacing rapidly as interest in the ancient world and biblical prophecy continues to intensify.

James Lasher, a seasoned writer and editor at Charisma Media, combines faith and storytelling with a background in journalism from Otterbein University and ministry experience in Guatemala and the LA Dream Center. A Marine Corps and Air Force veteran, he is the author of The Revelation of Jesus: A Common Man's Commentary and a contributor to Charisma magazine.