

Sudanese Find Refuge at Messianic Ministry

✖ The genocide staged by Sudan's Islamist regime keeps topping the lists of contemporary disasters. Some 3.5 million South Sudanese Christians and animists have been killed in a brutal "conversion" campaign that has lasted more than 25 years. Millions have fled their homes, seeking shelter from starvation, slavery and violent death.

But among the desert mountains across which Moses fled with another persecuted people long ago some of these Sudanese believers have found refuge in a place aptly named The Shelter.

The Shelter is a backpackers' hostel in Eilat, Israel, a busy port city located at the northern tip of the Red Sea between Jordan and Egypt. The ministry, run by Eilat's Messianic congregation-the only church in town-got involved when the refugees started crowding into Eilat in 2007.

"We soon had many shocked and injured people sitting in The Shelter's yard," recalled Judy Pex, who with husband John founded the church 29 years ago.

Church member Mansor, an ethnic Israeli Druze who shared their Arabic language, approached bakeries for leftover bread and shoe shops for free sandals. Most of the Sudanese had come barefoot. He and other young Israelis also persuaded a beach owner to let them throw a Red Sea welcome party.

“For us hanging out on the beach is an ordinary thing,” Mansor said. “For the Sudanese it was very special. One guy, Gabriel, who is in his late 20s, told me it had been the best day of his life. He had always been on the run, since he was a boy. He told me he was the only one under 30 from his village ... still alive.”

In a yet-to-be-published book, Judy Pex retells the life stories of some of the refugees. Their testimonies speak of the high hopes that many Sudanese Christians put in Israel.

“The title of my book, Tall, and With Smooth Skin, is a quote from Isaiah 18:7,” Judy Pex explained. “The Sudanese believe that they are the smooth-skinned people referred to, and that the river

mentioned is the Upper
Nile running through South Sudan. That is why they feel so affiliated with Israel, and risked their lives to get here.”

Many who made it to Eilat arrived with bullets in their legs, Judy Pex said. The Egyptian border police were under orders to fire. In some families the husband made it across carrying a child, while his wife got caught at the last minute.

In Israel the Sudanese were treated humanely, but not necessarily welcomed. Yien, now a leader in the Eilat Messianic congregation, spent a year in an Israeli prison.

“I was so wondering why no Christians came to visit,” said Yien, whose faith nearly cost him his life.

He moved to North Sudan to attend school,
hoping to become a pastor. While in Sudan’s capital, Khartoum, working for an evangelical church in its outreach to street children, he was caught and tortured by the Islamist military.

“The regime does not accept Christian

humanitarian aid," Yien said.

Contacting his wife or his pastor meant endangering them, so when Yien got a chance, he simply ran-through Egypt, through the desert. He has lived in Israel for two years and says he may be expelled at any time.

Since the Sudan peace agreement was signed in 2005, the South Sudanese no longer enjoy a refugee status, though conditions in Sudan are still desperate, and the referendum for autonomy, key to the peace agreement, is due in 2011.

Some of the Sudanese Christians are opting to return to their homeland with the help of the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem (ICEJ) in a controversial repatriation project. The ICEJ argues that the repatriates can help rebuild the country. But Sudanese pastors in exile and concerned Israeli believers told Charisma that South Sudan is anything but safe for returning women and children.

At The Shelter in Eilat, 17-year-old Johannes says he is willing to return-to look for his mother who he has not seen for 12 years. Mansor, his youth leader, is worried. "It is a very bad idea," he said, "but what can you say to a kid wanting to find his mom?"
