

A Bridge Between Nations: What Is God Doing Around the World?

“Watch South Africa. Watch South Africa.”

These were the words Alwyn Uys felt deeply in his spirit as God began revealing a divine connection between South Africa and America. Something bigger than politics is unfolding—a movement, a rearrangement, a pivotal shift in history.

“I saw America in God’s right hand and I saw South Africa in God’s left hand.” The right hand signifies power, favor and authority, and Uys believes this signals a new outpouring of divine favor upon America. But this doesn’t mean the nation is “out of the woods.” America is in a fragile, birthing process, teetering on the edge of something enormous.

Meanwhile, South Africa, held in God’s left hand, is undergoing a different process—judgment, correction and a necessary reordering.

“Africa, in order for me to use you, there has to be reorder.” This shaking, this flipping, this turning things upside-down is not comfortable, but it is necessary. “Africa, I love you... but these things have to take place.”

And then there is Donald Trump. “I saw Donald Trump shaking hands with Cyril Ramaphosa... It was a stern handshake, a stoic handshake, a firm handshake.” Though Trump did not speak in the vision, his body language said it all: Don’t mess this up. A second chance. A restoration of relationships. A rectifying moment between the two nations.

Then the vision shifted. A bridge appeared, stretching from the Cape of South Africa to America. "Obviously, this is not a real bridge," Uys clarifies, "but a bridge being built, a relationship being restored." This divine bridge, ordained by God, is making what was once impossible possible. But it won't come easily. "A bridge takes a lot of planning, a lot of engineering, a lot of work, a lot of rules."

And yet, despite all opposition, the bridge is being built. God is at work.

"Watch Africa. Watch South Africa. Watch America." Something is coming. Something that will impact generations to come.
