

Assemblies of God Partners With Church Tech Company to Tackle Biblical Illiteracy

The Assemblies of God, the world's largest Pentecostal denomination, and Faithlife, a leading church technology company and the makers of Logos Bible Software, have joined forces to tackle Bible illiteracy through the creation of the Bible Engagement Project.

A first-of-its-kind resource, the Bible Engagement Project delivers digital Bible study resources to equip pastors and their congregants with the tools to deepen their congregant's knowledge and appreciation of Scripture, strengthen families and relationships, and root their church in God's Word.

"Church leaders recognize that Bible engagement is at an all-time low and many are overwhelmed about what to do while also being concerned about what's at stake for future generations," said Rick DuBose, assistant general superintendent of Assemblies of God. "The Bible Engagement Project was developed in partnership with Faithlife to provide a solution to help pastors engage with their entire congregation in Scripture while cultivating a passion and hunger for the Bible among individuals of all ages."

The creation of this project is in response to national data showing a steep decline in practical, emotional and missional Bible engagement. In 2019, Assemblies of God commissioned Barna for "Built on the Bible," a study of Bible engagement, which found 68% of people highly engaged with the Bible feel less anxious because they know God is in control compared to 16% who have low engagement. Additionally, 88% of highly engaged individuals seek God's wisdom to help them do the right thing versus compared to 27% of individuals with low

Bible engagement.

“We all have access to a Bible, that’s not the issue. The problem is that many Christians are not authentically engaged with the Scriptures, which has led to a generation of believers who do not really understand what they believe or how God’s Word should inform their lives,” said Faithlife Founder and CEO Bob Pritchett. “The Bible Engagement Project seeks to tackle this issue head-on by providing pastors a special-edition version of Logos Bible Software to take their Bible study to the next level and an app and corresponding curriculum that seeks to educate every church member, from children to elders, on the meaning of God’s Word in an age-appropriate and effective manner.”

The Bible Engagement Project is a subscription delivered through an app developed exclusively by Faithlife and includes:

- Listen Bible Study curriculum, developed by the Assemblies of God to provide a walk through the entire Bible from Genesis to Revelation taught via 10, four-week sessions that are age-aligned so children, youth and adults can grow together, and
- Logos Bible Software, a special edition of Faithlife’s comprehensive digital Bible study app curated by Assemblies of God and made for deep pastoral research, word study and writing.

Additionally, the Bible Engagement Project app allows for quick access to all small group, youth, children and family lessons and videos as well as the ability to read and study the Bible, take notes and stay in touch with one’s small group members.

The Bible Engagement Project App will officially release Aug. 1, 2020, but churches can sign up now and receive immediate access to Logos Bible Software. To learn more about the Bible Engagement Project and how to purchase it for your church,
