

Behind the Scenes Following Her Election Loss, Hillary Clinton Suffered a Meltdown

There was a lot of confusion about why former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton would abandon all of her supporters following her loss in last week's presidential election.

Now, we may know why.

According to multiple media reports, quoting unnamed Secret Service sources, Clinton flew into an obscenity-laced temper tantrum when she realized she had lost the election to Donald Trump. She pounded on furniture, threw objects around the room, and at one point had to be physically restrained from attacking her campaign manager, Robby Mook, and campaign chairman, John Podesta.

As R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr. reported for The American Spectator:

Sources have told The American Spectator that on Tuesday night, after Hillary realized she had lost, she went into a rage. Secret Service officers told at least one source that she began yelling, screaming obscenities and pounding furniture. She picked up objects and threw them at attendants and staff. She was in an uncontrollable rage. Her aides could not allow her to come out in public. It would take her hours to calm down.

According to talk radio host Todd Kincannon, a CNN reporter knew about the incident, but was prohibited from reporting it. He shared some of the details via social media:

CNN reporter tells me Hillary became physically violent toward Robby Mook and John Podesta around midnight; had to be briefly restrained ...

She was in a “psychotic drunken rage” according to my reporter friend. Doctor added sedatives to the mix ...

The CNN reporter didn't fail to report it. His editors will not let him. CNN has banned all “Hillary in the bunker” stories.