

Border Patrol Agents Sound the Alarm of a Clinton Presidency

Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump hasn't been shy about receiving the first-ever endorsement of the National Border Patrol Council, the official union representing 16,500 U.S. border patrol agents.

Having made border security—and by extension, national security—a central theme of his campaign, the GOP nominee has highlighted an issue the Border Patrol agents know quite well. With the critical general election now just seven days away, and on the heels of a new report that the federal government is covering up the immense problem at the southern border, NBPC President Brandon Judd issued the following statement:

In 2014 the United States Border Patrol experienced a crisis at the border. Just ahead of the presidential election, that crisis is reaching epic proportions—an emergency even worse than 2014, and rising. Yet the Democratic nominee, Hillary Clinton, refuses to even acknowledge the disaster—in fact, she is pushing for, in her words, “open borders.” On top of that, there is a media blackout on the border emergency unfolding days before the election.

Mrs. Clinton's extreme plan will expand upon the policies that is the cause of the current crisis, including the president's unconstitutional executive amnesty orders—triggering a Constitutional Crisis. Her plan will erode the physical and economic security of this great nation and all of its residents. Her plan means an open door to criminal cartels, drug dealers, and even terrorists. Her plan includes amnesty in 100 days in the middle of a border emergency, Social Security and Medicare for unlawful entrants, and the expansion of catch-and-release policies that are overwhelming border towns, straining U.S. communities, and threatening innocent lives. Her failure to address the border crisis, and her push to open the border altogether, disenfranchises millions of Americans who demand our borders be secure.

Border Patrol Agents are capable and willing to secure the border of the United States, but we must have a leader willing to remove that shackles that bind our law enforcement officers and keep them from fulfilling their important mission, Donald Trump is that leader.
