

Bryce Crawford Warns Satanic Influence and End-Times Deception Are Escalating Across America

Evangelist Bryce Crawford is not afraid to walk into some of the darkest spiritual environments in America.

From conversations with Satanists and members of the Ku Klux Klan to witnessing the chaos of Burning Man, Crawford says his mission is not condemnation, but bringing the gospel directly into places many Christians avoid.

During an appearance on the Shawn Ryan Show, Crawford described how his ministry intentionally enters hostile territory to engage people face-to-face with truth.

"We started this ministry because not enough people are doing it," Crawford said. "We're too scared of the response."

Crawford explained that he approaches people with questions and conversation rather than aggression, believing many are spiritually hungry beneath the surface.

"If you can be so extreme for something that's not true," he said, referring to some of the radical groups he encounters, "how much more on fire could you be for something if you found out it was the truth?"

One of the most surprising moments in the interview came as Crawford discussed recently sitting down with televangelist Kenneth Copeland. While Crawford openly stated that he rejects prosperity gospel theology, he said he encountered something deeply human during their private interaction.

“He looks at me and just goes, ‘I really need Jesus. Like, I need Him every day,’” Crawford said. “When I’m looking at an 89-year-old man who’s crying over the fact that no one on camera or on recording is seeing that he’s looking at me and says, ‘I need Jesus desperately every day,’ it made me have a soft spot.”

The discussion then shifted toward racial extremism and identity-based movements, including Black Hebrew Israelite ideology and the KKK. Crawford firmly rejected any theology that assigns spiritual value based on ethnicity.

“The KKK leader looked at me in the face and said Black people and Asian people are of lesser moral value than white people,” Crawford said. “That broke my heart.”

Crawford argued that the cross destroys every racial hierarchy created by man.

“The price tag that Jesus Christ put on my life was His own,” he said. “To think that someone can’t receive this unconditional love just because of their skin color or where they grew up—we need Jesus.”

Later in the interview, Crawford addressed growing fascination with the end times. While acknowledging the increasing darkness and deception in culture, he warned Christians against sensationalism and fear-based speculation about prophecy.

“We should look for signs, and we will know,” Crawford said. “But I want to be cautious at making an absolute truth claim about it, because I don’t want to lead people astray.”

Instead of panic, Crawford pointed believers toward readiness.

Using the imagery of a traditional Galilean wedding, Crawford explained how a bride would remain dressed and prepared because she did not know when the bridegroom would return for her.

“In the same way,” Crawford said, “we want to be a bride that is ready for Christ to return.”

As cultural confusion, division and spiritual darkness continue rising across society, Crawford believes Christians cannot afford spiritual apathy.

“We need Jesus,” he said plainly. “People are tired of being fed lies.”
