

Chick-fil-A CEO Dan Cathy Regrets 'Discrediting' Faith-Based Organizations

The CEO of Chick-fil-A, Dan Cathy, has expressed his regret over his company's cutting of charitable funding to certain faith-based organizations.

In November of last year, the historically faith-based fast-food chain announced it would be redirecting philanthropic funds away from organizations including the Salvation Army and The Fellowship of Christian Athletes—both of whom support traditional Christian marriage.

The company was rocked by a major backlash in the media, with many accusing them of caving to the LGBT agenda and refusing to channel funds to organizations that champion marriage between one man and one woman.
