

Chris Tomlin's Amazing, Faith-Filled Moment That Shaped 'The Last Supper' Movie

"No one's heard it."

It's easy to chalk things up to coincidence, to believe in happy accidents and happenstance. Chris Tomlin could have very easily credited chance – random serendipity – for his timely connection to an upcoming Christian movie. But he doesn't; instead, he sees it as divine, predestined providence.

The famed recording artist and worship leader is stepping into a new role: executive producer.

Tomlin, 52, is seated in the producer's chair for the new movie, "The Last Supper," set to debut in theaters nationwide March 14. The film, from Pinnacle Peak Pictures, the distribution studio launched nearly 20 years ago by David A.R. White of Pure Flix fame, centers on the days leading up to wayward disciple Judas' betrayal of Jesus as the Savior's closest followers gather for a final meal before His impending crucifixion.

When he was first approached by the creators of "The Last Supper," Tomlin said they asked if he had a song – or could write one – that would work for the film.
