

Could Trump Be the Next Great Unifier?

In answer to a question posed by CNN's Jake Tapper on Oct. 25, 2015, as to whether his presidency would result in a season of bipartisanship, then-candidate Donald Trump answered, "I absolutely think so I will be a great unifier for our country."

Could it be that, fresh from his seemingly miraculous escape from death this past Saturday, Trump could become that man? Is it possible?

In that same Tapper interview, Trump said:

"The level of hatred between Republicans and Democrats was unbelievable. The level of—I've never seen anything like it. I'm going to unify. This country is totally divided. Barack Obama has divided this country unbelievably. And it's all, it's all hatred, what can I tell you. I've never seen anything like it."

Unfortunately, for a myriad of reasons, the level of hatred of which Trump spoke has only intensified, both during and after his presidency.

Evidence of this can be found in two comments that came in response to my Facebook post urging everyone on all sides to "tone things down."
