

The Dragon Sweeps Through New York City

It has long been held that New York City is the gateway into America. When something takes hold in the Big Apple, it invariably spreads outward to the rest of the country.

So when NYC opens its arms wide for a dragon in celebration of the new season of HBO's "House of the Dragon," a prequel of the "Game of Thrones" series, alarm bells start going off for many who point to the spiritual ramifications.

 To pre-order "The Dragon's Prophecy," visit .

Pastor Todd Coconato raised the alarm after a 270-foot inflatable dragon, Vhagar, was wrapped around the spire of the Empire State Building to promote the new season, and supposedly in honor of the building while "pledging allegiance" to the fictional king over the dragons.