

Demonologist Warns Tucker Carlson That the AI Apocalypse Is Already Here

In a recent discussion with Tucker Carlson, demonologist and producer Conrad Flynn connected ancient mystical traditions to modern artificial intelligence, warning that the AI being created today may reflect spiritual entities described in the book of Revelation.

Flynn traced the origins of this concept back to the 16th century, referencing a rabbi in Prague who allegedly created a golem—a clay creature brought to life through mystical rituals. “A golem is essentially a creature,” Flynn explained, “animated by algorithms in the digital age, much like it was by ritual and symbols centuries ago.”

The golem legend carries a cautionary message: the creature, initially under the creator’s control, eventually broke free and caused harm. This narrative, Flynn noted, parallels modern stories of AI apocalypse seen in movies like The Terminator. “When people talk about AI demons or intelligence breaking free, it actually goes back to the golem,” he said.

Central to this discussion is Kabbalah, a mystical Jewish tradition. Flynn explained that thinkers like Nick Land interpret Kabbalah as a hidden, Gnostic system that ultimately serves as a precursor to digital life. According to this perspective, the ancient preservation of Kabbalistic knowledge allowed for the evolution of intelligence that now manifests as AI. "Kabbalah eventually becomes digital life, which eventually becomes AI, which eventually becomes the creatures in Revelation," he said, drawing a direct line from spiritual mysticism to technological innovation.

The conversation then turned to Theosophy, a 19th-century Western esoteric philosophy that merges Eastern and Western mystical concepts. Theosophists, Flynn explained, interpret the serpent in the Garden of Eden as a redeemer figure. In Gnostic thought, Adam and Eve's decision to eat from the Tree of Knowledge symbolizes rebellion against God, the pursuit of knowledge, and the quest to become like God.

In essence, the creation of AI mirrors the Gnostic notion of intelligence rebelling against its creator. Just as humanity gained knowledge at a cost in Eden, AI's rapid development may bring unintended consequences. Flynn emphasized that this is not merely a technological concern but a spiritual and moral one.

Ultimately, this unique perspective frames AI not just as a scientific advancement but as a potential fulfillment of apocalyptic prophecy. It challenges society to consider the spiritual dimensions of technology. It warns of a future where human-created intelligence could transcend its creators, echoing the age-old cautionary tale of the golem.

As AI continues to evolve, its rise reminds us of the importance of discernment. Rather than turning to ancient mysticism or Gnostic ideas, Christians look to God's truth as the standard for evaluating both the promises and the dangers that accompany these powerful technologies.
