A pastor at a Presbyterian church gave a message to her congregants that if Jesus was walking the earth right now, she believes He would help with the pro-choice cause.

"If Jesus were here today, He would be a clinic escort," the pastor says. "Distracting women from the hatred of the protestors.

"I expect He would have a stern word for self-righteous legislators who use abortion as a political issue rather than showing compassion for the people seeking abortions," she continues. "If Jesus were giving His sermon today, He might also have said 'blessed are those who end pregnancies.'"

If you thought this twisting of the Sermon on the Mount couldn't get any worse, it does.

"I have been pregnant four times. I have had two abortions and I have two amazing children. Each of my reproductive decisions to have children and not to have children were sacred decisions because they reflect the moral responsibility of reproductive power. That is part of our inheritance as human are those who end pregnancies for they will be known for their lovingkindness," the pastor concludes.
