

Donald Trump: 'I Will Defend, Life, Liberty, and Faith'

The Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump has just made a powerful final argument to evangelical voters in this year's presidential election.

In the 44-second spot, which is being shared with evangelicals across the country, Trump spells out what is at stake Tuesday and how Christians can play a role in defending life, liberty, and faith in America. He said:

Christians are under attack, and our leaders in Washington have done nothing but make it worse. Abroad, Christians are killed for their faith. At home, Christians are persecuted and marginalized.

This election will decide the future of life, liberty, and faith in America. A vote for Hillary Clinton is a vote for taxpayer-funded abortion on demand, a vote for a liberal Supreme Court for at least the next generation, a vote for new attacks on your religious liberty, which you cannot have. You cannot let that happen.

I will defend life, liberty, and faith, and together, we will make America great again.
