

Election 2024: Whose Values Will US Embrace?

CBS News anchor Elaine Quijano recently interviewed James Carville (born 1944), the “Ragin’ Cajun” political consultant, media celebrity and Democrat strategist who managed Bill Clinton as he ran for president in 1992. Carville says:

“Our primary identity should always be that we’re humans and Americans. I love Cinco de Mayo and all the cultural things different people have, but I believe in pluralism and that we’re all part of this.

I hate it when we start trying to exclude people; most people feel that way. People have an identity, and I don’t have an issue with that, but when you talk about your identity first and country second, people who don’t share your identity will not be persuaded.

I’m an American, and I want us to have a country where everybody respects other people and gets along. I can’t do anything about my identity any more than anybody else. Still, we should talk to people in a clear language that they understand and appeal to something better than just one’s identity.

Carville’s argument would seem more earnest if he had been as forceful in the 2020 presidential election campaign, as leftists and Black Lives Matter anarchists burned and looted the nation’s cities.

After all, Democratic leaders are the ones who sanction biological boys competing against girls at state track and field championships, canonize homosexual and gender dysphoria and foment race division.

However, Carville's acclaimed political antenna is picking up distress signals from Americans four months before the Nov. 5 election, resulting from a failed Biden presidency:
