

Faculty Chair Compares on-Campus Chick-fil-A to Selling Porn in College Bookstore

In what has to be one of the most bizarre comparisons I've ever come across, a faculty chair at a university in California likened the 25-year-old Chick-fil-A on campus to selling pornography in the school's bookstore.

The faculty senate of Cal Poly San Luis Obispo voted overwhelmingly to kick Chick-fil-A off campus, citing the fast-food chain's support of "anti-LGBT causes," referring to the donations CEO Dan Cathy has made to various nonprofit, faith-based organizations, according to The San Francisco Chronicle.

Thomas Gutierrez, vice chair of the college's academic senate, told the on-campus newspaper Mustang News, "We don't sell pornography in the bookstore and we don't have a Hooters on campus—we already pre-select those kind of things based on our existing values."

Click here to read the rest of this story from our content partners at Faithwire.

Listen to the podcast for an interview with Trudy Cathy, daughter of Chick-fil-A founder S. Truett Cathy.