

Florida Mom Praises God as Twins, Born at 21 Weeks, Leave Hospital

After being in the hospital for 137 days, Taylor Davis took home the youngest preemie twins to ever survive at the Golisano Children's Hospital in Fort Myers, Florida.

"We are just so blessed," the mother told WINK-TV. "There are really no other words. It is unreal. Whenever I went in there at 21 [weeks] and 3 [days], they said they weren't viable, so we weren't settling for that."

On Monday, Davis and her twin babies—Avery and Emersyn—were released from the hospital, the twins now each weighing in at seven pounds.

Davis, who lay upside down in her hospital bed for six days in hopes of keeping her babies in her womb longer, said she and her husband, Mark, put their premature daughters' survival and health in God's hands.

"I cried the whole time, and I wasn't crying like happiness," the mother said. "I was crying in fear of, 'Are they going to be able to save her?' It is crazy, because they are twins, but they are completely opposite, born three days apart, different months, different ways of being birthed and completely different personalities. It is just so funny how they are twins but they couldn't be more different."

Avery was born Oct. 29 and weighed just one pound. Three days later, Davis suffered a complication that caused her to begin bleeding out, forcing doctors to extract Emersyn via an emergency C-section. She was born weighing only one pound and one ounce.
