Their idea comes in response to the recent announcement that Puerto Rican artist Bad Bunny will be the featured entertainment for the 2026 Apple Music Super Bowl halftime show—a 12- to 15-minute slot that could be seen by over 100 million people.

Bad Bunny is widely known for his sexually explicit lyrics.

"What if we did an alternative, family-friendly halftime show for the Super Bowl?" Asbury said in a video on social media. "Every year, everyone is all up in arms about the performer for the halftime show, and I get it because, 9 times out of 10, it's raunchy as heck."
