

Helping Someone in Need This Christmas

Have you realized that the best Christmas present you can give is to help someone else escape from financial bondage?

If you have struggled against financial bondage at one time, you can turn your own struggle for freedom into a helping hand for someone in need.

Since you've suffered from your own financial troubles, the most important thing you have is empathy. You know that struggling people do not need an extra dose of condemnation on top of the load they already carry. Instead, they need to 'fess up to their problems, repent and receive forgiveness for their failures. It works with God, and it works with people. Help them clear away the wreckage of the past and start to build their lives anew.

The next important skill you have is the experience to recognize that there will be down days on the road to financial freedom. You seldom win every battle. But you also know that perseverance pays off, so when they fall, encourage them to get back up and get in the fight. Sometimes just having a friend to encourage you and talk you through your fears makes all the difference.

You do not have to be an expert in law, accounting or finance to help someone deal with a debt crisis. That is why we developed our System of Debt Relief. However, we have found that a person struggling to establish a debt relief plan will benefit from having a sympathetic friend to bounce ideas off of. You will find that once you develop your own debt relief plan, it is much easier to help someone else develop theirs. They have to make the tough decisions, but you can help the medicine go down.
