

Home Robots Are Here: Are We Living in the Days of Revelation?

While talk about robots taking over the world has long been a movie trope for decades, the reality of robots as part of our daily lives just got a whole lot closer.

This is where robotics company iX's new Neo humanoid robot comes into play. As Engadget reports, these $20,000 humanoid robots are now available for pre-sale to do household chores. As the article notes, "Users will be able to control NEO and have it accomplish tasks around the house with the click of a button or a verbal command. It will come with the ability to do basic tasks autonomously when it starts shipping next year, including opening doors, fetching items and turning the lights on or off."

Creepy? I'd say so. Not only will Neo be able to perform these tasks, but those who want these home robots to do more extravagant tasks must be "comfortable with the idea of a human teleoperator controlling the robot remotely and seeing inside their homes," as Engadget writes.

Not only are the robots essentially being taught to do household chores on their own, but having the requirement of allowing a remote operator inside your home means literally letting strangers into all your business. Quite possibly, all of this sounds much like that of the beast system. How much autonomy will these robots have once they advance? What about those who are gaining access to the homes of civilians? Could this be capitalized and used against those who disagree with the elite?

As technology races forward, the warnings of Scripture echo louder than ever. Revelation speaks of a time when “no one could buy or sell unless he had the mark” and when a global system of control would rise through deception and power. While AI and robotics promise convenience, they also open the door to surveillance, manipulation and dependency unlike anything humanity has ever known. The merging of artificial intelligence, data collection and human-like machines points toward a world where privacy, autonomy and even free will could be subtly eroded—preparing the stage for a system that knows, monitors and controls all.

This is a call to discernment: we must guard our hearts, our homes and our faith, trusting not in the works of man’s hands but in the sovereignty of Jesus Christ, who alone will reign when every counterfeit system collapses.
