

How to Bounce Back From Election Burnout

After the November 2020 election, disillusionment set in. The quest for the truth about the presidential elections ended—for me and for many of us around the nation—with no resolution.

If you are one of those people who has lost hope in our electoral system in the U.S., I pray the words that follow speak life back into you. We have experienced this national trauma together, and God wants to help us recover. So how do people of faith move on from such a dramatic election season?

As a political professional, do I believe there was voter fraud in this last presidential election? Yes, I do. I saw it myself.

Do I believe there was enough to produce a different presidential election outcome? I do not know that definitively. I do know there were provable injustices, and they were all but hidden.

Less than a week after the November election, I was flying to Las Vegas, Nevada. I did not go there to relax and recover from an intense season of running a congressional race and speaking on behalf of our Texas nonprofit, Christians Engaged, . Instead, the Holy Spirit moved me to head back into battle—to Clark County, the frontpiece of some of the fiercest allegations of voter fraud in the presidential race.

Exhausted, I could not stop until I discovered the truth in a state where the president had lost by only 33,000 votes. Clark County had report after report of voter fraud because of mail-in ballots. Officials had mailed out ballots to every registered voter whether they requested one or not—an obvious formula for disaster.
