Even as Iran is sending weapons to Russia in its unprovoked war against Ukraine, the Middle Eastern nation is still struggling to crush defiant protests on its streets.

Protests have lingered now for seven weeks and Iran is vowing to hold public trials to penalize as many as 1,000 protestors, according to .

It all started on September 16 when Mahsa Amini died under suspicious circumstances while in custody of the morality police, who arrested her for not wearing her hijab in accordance with government standards.

The Law Enforcement Command of the Islamic Republic of Iran claims she had a heart attack and fell into a coma before they transported her to the hospital. But eyewitnesses offer a different story, insisting she was essentially beaten to death.

Protests erupted hours after her death, leading the Iranian government to impose an Internet blackout and nationwide restrictions on social media. Pro-government protestors are battling against anti-government protestors, calling for their execution.
