

New Poll Has Found Public Support for Capitalism Is Growing in America

The meteoric rise of Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez and other young progressive politicians has led many to believe that the American public must be warming up to socialism. But what if that isn't true at all? Certainly there is a certain segment of the population that absolutely embraces the message that AOC, Bernie Sanders, Elizabeth Warren and other socialists are preaching, but could it be possible that the American people as a whole are actually moving in the opposite direction? According to a shocking Fox News poll that just came out, the percentage of Americans that want the government to leave them alone is going up, and the percentage of Americans that want the government to lend them a hand is going down:

The 34 percent saying "lend me a hand" is down from 41 percent last year and 39 percent in 2016. The 55 percent who would tell the government "leave me alone" is up from 51 percent in 2018 and 54 percent in 2016.

You would think that these numbers should be very encouraging for President Trump and the Republican Party, because traditionally the idea of "limited government" has been central to the conservative message in this country.

The survey also found that the percentage of Americans that have a positive view of capitalism is more than twice as high as the percentage of Americans that have a positive view of socialism:
