

President-Elect Trump Names His White House Communications Team

President-elect Donald Trump probably didn't surprise too many people when he announced his White House communications team on Thursday.

Still, he faced a surprising amount of pressure from the liberal mainstream media to name those staffers this week. So, with the news cycle winding down as we approach the Christmas holiday, he obliged.

And the presidential transition team communications staff announced their own hiring:

The president-elect named Sean Spicer assistant to the president and press secretary; Hope Hicks, assistant to the president and director of strategic communications; Jason Miller, assistant to the president and director of communications; and Dan Scavino, assistant to the president and director of social media.

"Sean, Hope, Jason and Dan have been key members of my team during the campaign and transition. I am excited they will be leading the team that will communicate my agenda that will Make America Great Again," said President-elect Trump.

And now you know for sure what everyone has suspected all along. {eoa}