

PTC Demands AT&T Pull Pornographic Shows, Hardcore Porn

The Parent's Television Council (PTC) launched a petition against AT&T to stop children from stumbling across pornographic content.

"AT&T is a $19 billion Texas-based company that owns HBO and DirecTV," said PTC president Tim Winter in an email to PTC supporters. "Both networks are damaging tens of millions of families with horrible porn streaming into our homes with programs targeting our children."

Like PTC, Movieguide® has warned parents of the negative effects porn has on media consumers, specifically youngsters. Additionally, porn is seeping into the lives of young adults too. In recent days even, Steven Spielberg's daughter said she's getting into the porn industry.

Winter shared about his interactions with HBO, who, in turn, dismissed his concerns:

Last month, when I wrote to ask you to renew your support for 2020, I promised that two of PTC's major goals for 2020 would include canceling AT&T porn shows like Euphoria and cleaning up streaming and satellite TV.

AT&T owns HBO, the creator of Euphoria. In response to our letters and petitions, AT&T's HBO replied that Euphoria's 30 scenes of penises, child rape, and sexual choking were "creative freedom." They called this explicit sexual violence "the art of TV" that will "entertain and engage audiences, and at times encourage a public dialogue."

Sadly, HBO's lewd programming isn't a new trend. Movieguide® previously covered that descriptions of EUPHORIA show reveal that it's vile beyond belief.
