

Rabbi Schneider Shares Chloe Cole's Powerful Detransitioner Testimony

Rabbi Kirt Schneider is exposing the kingdom of darkness permeating through the transgender movement through his interview with detransitioner activist, Chloe Cole. Like so many others her age, Cole was exposed to the LGBT agenda that made her question her validity as a female, which led her to transition to a boy as a teenager.

"I decided at 12 that I was a boy and this gender transition spanned through pretty much my entire teenage life," Cole said. "I started medicalization at 13. I started taking puberty suppressants and I was put on cross-sex hormones; I was put on testosterone which is the male sex hormone, and at 15 I underwent a surgery to remove my breasts permanently."

While Cole was living what she thought was her dream of becoming a boy, she quickly found out this was a massive mistake.

"It was only a year afterward though, at 16, that was when I decided that I couldn't keep doing it because the surgery was just too much for me," Cole said. "It was a great shock to me in pretty much every way. The recovery was incredibly difficult; I'm still going through the healing process."

The biggest lie that the enemy is trying to convince this generation of is that they are not created correctly as they are in the image of male and female. This is how Cole found herself hooked into the LGBT community. After experiencing negative societal messages about femininity, she began to question her worth. The media's portrayal of femininity as trivial and its failure to celebrate the blessings of womanhood left her feeling lost. She eventually found herself attracted to the transgender community online, where she thought she had found the answers to what she was looking for.

"I started using social media at around the age of 12," Cole said. "I mainly use Instagram because that's what all my friends were using and I was seeing a lot of like, very left-wing content. A lot of it was like feminist content, some of it was like LGBT-oriented and overwhelmingly about the transgender community in specific."

Cole said it was through social media she not only learned about transgender ideologies, but she was also indoctrinated by the pro-choice platform that made her fearful of being a woman.

"The way that they talked about children and unborn babies, like they would use words like 'parasite' to describe a baby growing within a mother's womb and it made me really scared to have a child of my own," Cole said.

While Cole is not the only young person to be captivated by these deceptions, she hopes that by speaking up and sharing her own experience others will be able to accept themselves exactly as God created them. It is through accepting maleness and femaleness as God designed it that we each can experience true freedom.

"To be able to acknowledge that without any strings attached to your mind, just to accept it is very freeing," Cole said.
