

Ray Comfort Slams 'Noah,' Accuses Director of 'Sensationalizing' for Profit

Oscar-winning actor Russell Crowe is hoping Pope Francis will watch his new biblical adventure story Noah. But to Los Angeles-based filmmaker Ray Comfort, the movie is anything but a "biblical adventure."

Comfort, whose award-winning movies have been seen by millions, has produced his own version of Noah, which is being released on the same day as the Hollywood version.

"It seems like a 'hail Mary' to the pope. Perhaps he, Darren Aronofsky and Paramount should have listened to their critics, when they had prescreening a long time ago," Comfort says. "Maybe they will even consider making a sequel called 'Muhammad,' where they portray him as an evil character as they did with Noah, and see if Muslims file in two-by-two to see it. But they wouldn't dare malign Muhammad's character, because they know that there would be serious repercussions. With Noah they have shown that they have no respect for Christians and Jews by painting Noah as a psychopath.

"It's a no-brainer for Hollywood to have success at the box office. All they need do is make a movie about the Bible, have their 'poetic license,' but stay true to the Scriptures—and we will support you by the millions."

Comfort then cited The Ten Commandments and Ben Hur as examples. The Ten Commandments became the highest-grossing film of 1956 and Ben-Hur: A Tale of Christ was the highest grossing film of 1959.

"They have no qualms about sensationalizing the story of Noah in order to make it more profitable. That's their bottom line. But the movie strays so far from the biblical account that it omits its essential message: God's judgment for man's sin and evil," Comfort says.

"Taking 'poetic license' on this story further erodes the public's perception of the biblical account—and of the Bible in general," he says. "That's why we produced our version of Noah, which looks at him from a different perspective. We reveal 10 undeniable Bible prophecies that link to Noah, and show that we are living in what the Bible calls 'the last days.'"
