

'Reset Movement' Calls Next Generation to Go 'All In' for Jesus

Hitting the "reset" button on a phone, clock or computer clears out the old information and gives the device a fresh start.

Hitting the "reset" button on life isn't quite as easy. But Nick Hall believes it can be done.

"Reset means to get the system working towards its intended or created purpose," says Hall, a young evangelist who is taking the Jesus-centered Reset Movement around the United States. "We're saying, 'God, we want to see a supernatural reset take place.'"

Since mid-September, the Reset Movement has spread from Seattle to New York City as Hall and a group of passionate Christ followers crisscross the country, empowering a generation to "live fully for Jesus."

Collaborating with music artists such as Rend Collective, Lacey Sturm and Propaganda, Hall plans to reach 2.5 million people in 200 cities by the fall of 2015. The first leg of the movement has already taken place in almost 30 cities.

"We're just bringing this single message: that God is offering a reset to this generation," Hall says. "He's offering a reset for this country right now, whether people have been on the fence or whether they've been living the life they want to live.

"Even for churches, we've maybe made it about secondary issues. We've become defined by things we're against as opposed to things we're for. There's a reset button for that too.”

Hall is intentionally crossing ministry and denominational lines, calling on Christ followers to come together to reach the next generation.

The Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA) is one of several ministries partnering with the Reset Movement, which Hall says resembles the early days of Youth for Christ—a ministry that was born in the 1940s with Billy Graham as its first full-time evangelist.

“At the beginning of Billy Graham’s ministry, he would go across the country, and he was calling youth for Christ,” Hall says. “We were like, ‘What would it look like for a modern-day movement to unfold today—a generation-defining moment in our day, with young people going ‘all in’ for God?’ That birthed the concept and the dream and the vision for Reset.”

As Hall travels from city to city, he preaches a Bible-based message that calls teens and 20-somethings to fully dedicate their lives to Christ and build their faith through prayer, Bible study, loving others and sharing the gospel.

Reset shares some common traits with the BGEA’s My Hope With Billy Graham movement, which culminates Thursday through Sunday in the United States and Canada. The two ministries support each other in their common goal to reach the lost with the hope of Christ.

“There’s going to be a lot of commonalities, because the DNA of our ministry has directly been shaped by the Billy Graham team,” Hall says.

Like Reset, My Hope is a nationwide outreach that calls believers to share the gospel with unreached friends and neighbors. But unlike Reset, My Hope is aimed at people of all ages and is centered around several powerful videos that will play on national TV as well as stream online and is available on DVD.

While the Reset Movement is just beginning—with a goal of holding the largest gathering of youth in the history of the nation in the fall of 2015—My Hope will culminate this week, as Billy Graham delivers a new message to the nation. Christians are in the process of inviting friends and family to their homes to watch the message, which is woven together with real-life stories of people who discovered Jesus and invited Him to change their lives.

Hall says both ministries share the same heart and the same goal.

“And we’re asking God to do something bigger than any of us can do on our own,” he says.

Since September, hundreds of young people have made decisions to accept Christ through the Reset Movement, and thousands more have been encouraged to get off the sidelines and go “all in” for Jesus.

“When you hit the reset button on your iPhone, it’s supposed to correct the errors you’ve made and get it working the way Apple intended it to function,” Hall says.

As he prepares to take the Reset message to even more cities, he’s praying the next generation will experience the supernatural reset that only Jesus can offer—forgiven sins, a fresh start and a chance to live close to God, the way He always intended.
