Speaking first about the reality of Nephilim as detailed in Genesis, Al Robertson points out that we see the discussion of giants even further into Scripture, pointing to Goliath and other 10-foot giants.

What exactly is the purpose of discussing these supernaturally tall and large beings? They argued that understanding this spiritual invasion helps unlock the deeper meaning behind Jesus’ mission—not just to bring salvation but to overthrow demonic strongholds and reclaim the nations under God’s dominion.

One striking point raised in the conversation was the connection between the Nephilim and the hybridization of humanity. The ancient giants were not merely mythological figures but part of a greater plan by fallen angels to corrupt God’s creation.

Outside of the topic of the Nephilim and giants, the Robertsons also described their experience of becoming more open to the concept of the demonic affecting everyday people.

While he points out that a picture had fallen off on the porch, knocking out the power, the two recall how strange the timing was, which led Jase to reconsider his thought process on whether or not people could be influenced by the demonic.

Whether it’s Nephilim, the demonic or another topic which may be considered “fringe,” the reality is the spiritual realm affects all of us, whether we want to admit it or not.
