Cunning as a Snake

Genesis 3:1a (AMPC) says, “Now the serpent was more subtle and crafty than any living creature of the field.” Snakes are sneaky. They know how to hide, so it is extremely difficult to detect their presence in our lives. That’s because serpents are masters of camouflage technology.

Just think about snakes in the natural. Arizona boasts vast desert regions, and within those deserts you’ll find plenty of rattlesnakes. If you were to venture into that terrain, you would need to be on the alert for a rattler, because spotting one amid of sand, rocks and dirt can be incredibly challenging. Their scales perfectly blend in with their surroundings. They are truly camouflage masters.

Now shift your focus to the Amazon rainforest, with massive anacondas measuring more than 20 feet long and weighing up to 500 pounds. Despite their great size, these reptiles are a challenge to detect because they move silently, and their scales blend seamlessly with the jungle foliage. In fact, an anaconda slithers with such stealth that often, its prey remains oblivious to its presence until it is too late. By then, the snake has already encircled its unsuspecting victim and tightened its grip so death is inevitable. Without a doubt, these snakes are masters of camouflage technology.
