

Social Media Outcry Over PayPal Backtracking 'Misinformation Policy'

Read Time: 2 minutes 9 seconds

Over the weekend PayPal was in hot water over a new policy they reportedly published that said they would fine users $2,500 for spreading "misinformation." Conservative political commentators took to social media to highlight the companies new Acceptable Use Policy (AUP) calling on people to delete their PayPal accounts.

Now the big tech company is saying the AUP was sent out in error. "PayPal is not fining people for misinformation and this language was never intended to be inserted in our policy. Our teams are working to correct our policy pages. We're sorry for the confusion this has caused," a spokesperson told National Review.

The PayPal stock was down Monday following the outcry on social media. Political commentator, Candace Owens posted on her Instagram page that her followers should move their money out PayPal.

"PayPal has gone full communism, we know they're all jumping in that direction," Owens says. She believes they are targeting people who are perpetrators of "misinformation", targeted at censoring conservative and Christian voices.