

The Big Reason Why Nobody Is 'Keeping Up With the Kardashians'

The Kardashians used to be the queens of reality TV, but now they're looking more like court jesters after an embarrassing ratings decline in their ninth season of Keeping Up With the Kardashians.

The show garnered its lowest rating in three years.

But why is America no longer interested in keeping up with the Kardashians?

Maybe it's Kim Kardashian's 72-day marriage to Kris Humphries.

Maybe it's the drug use and sexualization rampant in the show.

Maybe it's the 58-year-old mom posting photos of herself in a tiny black bikini.

Or maybe it's because the majority of Americans have a completely different set of values than the once-princesses of reality TV.

Thankfully (or not) we live in a country with more than 200 channels available at our fingertips and a wonderful invention called the remote. With the touch of a button, Americans are leaving the Kardashians faster than a Kim and Kris marriage and tuning into the bearded family of Duck Dynasty and several other family-friendly reality shows.

One of the newest shows coming up in the family-friendly reality slate is Deion's Family Playbook, which is sure to be a ratings hit with the combination of Deion Sanders' witty and funny personality and the pro-faith and pro-family message of the show. Check out the clip below for a sample.

UP TV also produces a great reality show called Bulloch Family Ranch, about a family that takes troubled teens into their home and helps them get their lives back on track.

Try not to cry when you watch this clip:

A trip to Duck Dynasty's headquarters or the Bulloch family ranch might be the trick to get the Kardashians back on top of reality TV.

This article originally appeared on .