

Trump to Clinton: 'I'm Coming for You'

In an email he intends to have seen by his Democratic counterpart, Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump made his first personal appeal to potential campaign donors. In its subject line, the email states, "Hillary –I'm coming for you."

In the email, Trump tells his supporters he's "never been more confident of anything in my entire life." He said he's ready to be president, and that he's ready to fight for Americans.

"Touring the country for over a year, I've had the opportunity to meet the real America—the millions of people who have been betrayed by a rigged and corrupt system," he wrote. "I've met our brave and heroic veterans who've been cast to the shadows. ... I've met workers in Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania who've watched as their jobs and livelihood were shipped off to foreign countries. ... I've met middle-class American families struggling to save for their future and their children's. ... And I've met thousands more who have completely lost hope in our country's ability to lead and defend the free world."

Trump said we're living in an America that no longer resembles that which we grew up in. He said, "This is not the America we deserve," before adding that he will fight for every "forgotten American."

"I will never stop fighting until it's once again morning in America."
