In an Instagram post, Moore wrote, “These last two years I’ve been locked in on what really my life and in my career. It’s been scary at times, but it’s also been full of fresh vision and real excitement about the future. With that, I’ve made the bittersweet decision to end my relationship with Maverick City Music.”

Moore also discussed how it was his dream to bring people closer to God through music when Maverick City was launched.

When we started Mav, I was grateful to have community and belonging while fulfilling my dream of making music that would help people experience God. And we did ways I couldn’t have imagined.

Moore then thanked the fans and everyone who collaborated with Maverick City over the past few years. He then addressed that there is “certain business matters” that are being handled by his legal team.

This transition isn't easy. Maverick is something I poured my heart into, so it's almost like saying goodbye to your own kid, ha. I know there may be press and conversation around certain business matters that my legal team is handling. But my heart, my energy, and my focus are on what's ahead.

The dream hasn't changed. I'm stepping into this next phase ready to share my story and make music that helps people feel a little more human, a little more understood, and a little less alone.
