

Vanity Fair, Bruce 'Caitlyn' Jenner's Transgenderism and the End of Sports as We Know It?

With his Vanity Fair front page promotion, sports hero Bruce Jenner, now supposedly Caitlyn, will open a floodgate of immorality that will affect Americans for generations to come.

Jenner's decision will be exploited by the media and the education system throughout the world. Confused people will now have an adult transgender as a hero.

4 Winds Christian Athletics President Steve McConkey stood up against the International Olympic Committee in 2003 when they allowed transgenders in the Olympics. He was the only sports person publicly addressing the issue.

McConkey knew this decision would open the floodgates for immorality. Currently, 33 state high school associations allow boys to compete on girls teams, and vice versa. Now you have the Jenner situation.

Also, he has publicly stood up against the International Olympic Committee, U.S. Olympic Committee, NCAA, and USA Track and Field for caving into the gay agenda.

"We are living in a time where athletes will be monitored for what they believe," states Steve McConkey. "Athletes who believe homosexuality is a sin could be penalized by governing sports organizations."

McConkey has been slandered online by many, including BuzzFeed from New York City. On Feb. 4, it had an article saying conservatives like him cause transgenders to commit suicide.

BuzzFeed has a reach of 100 million people.

“Christians are on the verge of persecution that they have never experienced before in the United States,” says McConkey. “The Supreme Court’s same-sex decision this month is important, but already states are pushing for homosexuality. We need to pray and stand up even if we are in the minority. Only a revival can reverse what we see.”
