

VIDEO: How to Survive an EMP Attack on America

If the electrical grid was shut down and the nation was left without defense, would you know what to do?

According to an article in the Wall Street Journal, an EMP attack—that is, an electromagnetic pulse attack that would shut down the electric grid and leave the United States unable to launch defense systems—is the most significant threat to the United States.

But survival goes beyond not being able to check your social media feeds for a few days.

“[An] average town in America, and city, has about a 20- to 25-day food supply on hand,” author and historian William Forstchen says on the Jim Bakker Show.

If the United States descends into a state of desperation, Forstchen says we will enter a global conflict.

Watch the video to see what he means.