

Watch This Actress Deliver the Ultimate Surprise to Unsuspecting Parents

When Lindsay and Maj. Colin Culkin met, fell in love and got married, the two mutually decided to pursue adoption to grow their family. The couple—who now live in Carlsbad, California, after spending two years overseas for Maj. Culkin's military deployment—received paperwork for two twin girls and instantly knew that they had been called to bring the sisters into their family.

The Culkins officially brought the girls home last summer, fulfilling their adoption dream, but they have still been paying off the associated expenses months after the adoption was finalized.

For those who don't know, adoption can be an expensive process, sometimes exceeding $30,000 or more. And in this case, the Culkins brought two children into their home, a more costly endeavor than they had initially imagined.

"We really had not done the financial planning for adopting two children and then we saw these two girls and our hearts just went out to them," Maj. Culkin recently told Indivisible and Grey's Anatomy star Sarah Drew during a sit-down interview about the adoption.

He continued, "We knew that we had to figure out how to adopt both of them."
