

When the Fruit of Transactivism Hits You In the Face

It is one thing to talk about an LGBTQ+ “agenda.” It is another thing when the fruits of that agenda literally hit you in the face. But that is exactly what we are witnessing today as a result of radical LGBTQ+ activism, which represents some of the worst fruit of the sexual revolution.

Millions across the world were shocked by the perverse displays at the Paris 2024 opening ceremony. But those of us who have been following the trajectory of LGBTQ+ activism for years were not surprised at all. This is the natural fruit of a tree that is disordered from the roots up.

Yet as offensive as this massive media offense was, it did not directly affect our lives.

Things were different at a recent women’s cycling event in Washington state, where three biological males, teamed with three females in a two-way relay race, took the three top spots.

Sorry, ladies, for pushing the rest of you off the platform, but hey, it’s all about being inclusive, correct? Isn’t this exactly what America has been asking for all these years? Isn’t it simply a matter of rights?

Not according to cyclist Holly Lavesser, a woman, who said last year, “I think it’s very disheartening. As a young woman, you look up to these role models and you think the sky is the limit. You believe that if you put in enough training, if you have the talent, the skill, that you could be the best. But when you’re forced to compete against males that have these physical advantages, it’s just not a reality anymore.”
