

WikiLeaks: How Is Hillary's Head?

New evidence suggests Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton's campaign is still hiding a serious health condition that is perhaps related to her 2012 fall and subsequent concussion.

WikiLeaks released the email Monday, along with more than 1,700 others. In the email, which carried the subject line "Any sense of whether and when she wants to talk?" campaign chairman John Podesta asks communications director Jennifer Palmieri:

How bad is her head?

Palmieri responded:

Don't know.

Huma left here about an hour ago. I just pinged again to ask about prep, haven't heard back. She leaves at 6 pm for DC.

The exchange was dated Sept. 26, 2015, which also happened to be the day the U.S. State Department announced it found emails Clinton hadn't previously handed over. There were fewer than a dozen, but they were communications between herself and Gen. David Petraeus that began before she became secretary of state.

The unveiling of the email proved Clinton's claims she had handed over everything relevant to the State Department were false. The timing of the emails also proved her claims she didn't use her private email server until after she became secretary of state were also false.