

Hollywood Director Invests in Groups Encouraging Gender Confusion Among Kids

Hollywood director Paul Feig, best known for “Bridesmaids,” is once again making headlines for his outspoken opposition to President Donald Trump.

This time, Feig is putting his money where his mouth is, donating $300,000 to three LGBT activist organizations that focus on promoting gender ideology among children. The groups receiving funds include The Trevor Project, , and It Gets Better, according to Variety.

While Feig did not directly mention President Trump in his statement, he pushed the familiar left-wing narrative that LGBT individuals are somehow “losing their rights.” He told Variety, “In recent weeks, we have witnessed the dismantling of crucial protections for the health and safety of the LGBTQ+ community and, particularly, the transgender community.”

Notably, all three organizations Feig is funding advocate for policies that encourage and facilitate gender transitions for minors, often without parental knowledge or consent.

The Trevor Project, for instance, promotes gender transitions in children and has supported school policies that keep parents in the dark about their own kids’ struggles.

Translifeline provides financial assistance to minors seeking gender transition procedures, while It Gets Better pushes a narrative encouraging children to embrace LGBT identities as their defining characteristic.

The Hollywood producer has a history of anti-Trump activism, dating back to 2016 when his Ghostbusters reboot bombed at the box office. Rather than acknowledging the film's poor reception, Feig bizarrely blamed Trump and his supporters for its failure.

Now, with his latest political stunt, Feig continues to align himself with the radical left's efforts to reshape society's understanding of gender and sexuality—especially among children.
