

The Protest Circus: How Fake Rage and Intersectionality Became Tools of Confusion

For the past several days, the streets of Los Angeles have swelled with protestors, waving flags, shouting slogans, and blocking traffic in what they claim is a righteous stand against injustice. But scratch the surface, and you'll see there's no righteousness—only restlessness. No conviction—only confusion. And no purpose—just performative rage masquerading as moral urgency.

Tomorrow, Saturday, June 14, 2025, these same crowds are expected to return in force. But what are they protesting this time? That depends on who you ask—or what Twitter thread you happen to stumble into. One day, they claim outrage over ICE policy enforcement. Look for lots of protestors freshly “wew-wee’d” up to condemn Israel’s military strike on Iran. Never mind that the Iranian regime has funded terror proxies for decades, called openly for Israel’s destruction and recently crossed every red line drawn by both the West and the United Nations.

This is not protest with moral clarity. This is emotional theater.

We’re witnessing the implosion of what some academics and activists have glamorized under the term “intersectionality.” A term that once hinted at nuanced layers of injustice has now become a shallow, ideological bucket—one where activists throw every trendy grievance of the week, stir it with social media hysteria and then spill it out into the streets. The result? A cacophony of slogans with no coherence, and protestors who bounce from one outrage to the next without ever pausing to question whether the causes they're championing are even compatible.

Let's be clear: these aren't freedom fighters. They're not civil rights warriors. They're spiritual orphans—restless souls caught in a fog of postmodern delusion. They've traded eternal truth for emotional tantrums. And they've bought into a lie so flimsy it evaporates under the weight of a single question: "What exactly are you fighting for?"

That question rarely gets answered.

The truth is, this movement—if we can even call it that—isn't about justice at all. It's about moral chaos. A manufactured rage that draws no distinction between the wicked and the righteous. It's the latest iteration of the "useful idiot" syndrome from the Cold War era—a term once used to describe Western sympathizers who unwittingly furthered communist goals without understanding the deeper agenda at play.

That's what intersectionality has become: a tool of global ideological subversion. Under the guise of fighting oppression, it lures people—often well-meaning, earnest, but spiritually lost—into a web of contradictions. How else do you explain a group protesting ICE detention policies in the morning, then by sundown accusing Israel of genocide for defending itself against a nation that has threatened to wipe it off the map?

It's not about principles. It's about performance.

And worse, it's about manipulation.

This week's protests were not organic. They were stoked, seeded, amplified—and funded—by the same playbook used for decades by Marxist agitators: divide and conquer. Elevate grievance. Inflate victimhood. Exploit every tragedy. Then weaponize the fragile emotions against reality.

If you're still not convinced this is spiritual warfare, just look at the fruits. Rage. Confusion. Violence. Rebellion. Pride. Lies. These aren't the fruits of the Spirit. They are the fruits of a counterfeit kingdom—one that masquerades as justice while mocking righteousness.

And make no mistake, the enemy loves chaos. Satan doesn't care what lie you believe, as long as it's not the truth. And intersectionality offers an endless buffet of lies—each one tailor-made to make you feel morally superior while pulling you further from God.

These crowds in Los Angeles aren't just "activists." They are pawns in a larger strategy to deconstruct truth and dethrone God. They march, they shout, they hold up signs—but their hearts are far from the truth. Many don't even know why they're angry anymore. They just know they're supposed to be angry. It would be funny if it weren't so spiritually tragic.

Now is the time for Spirit-led believers to speak truth—not just to power, but to the confused. We must expose the hollowness of movements that refuse to anchor themselves in eternal truth. We must offer not just critiques, but clarity. Not just rebukes, but redemption.

Because underneath every misguided protestor is a soul Jesus died to save.

And it is only when the shouting stops and the dust settles that they will hear the whisper of truth calling them home.

Let us pray they listen before the next outrage distracts them again.
