

Ancient Discovery in Canada Older Than Egypt's Great Pyramid Stuns Archaeologists

An archaeological discovery in western Canada is drawing global attention after researchers uncovered what they describe as an 11,000-year-old Indigenous settlement near Sturgeon Lake, a site they say predates Egypt's Great Pyramid by more than 6,000 years.

As reported by the Daily Mail, archaeologists uncovered stone tools, fire pits and toolmaking materials that suggest the area functioned as a long-term settlement rather than a temporary hunting camp. Researchers also found charcoal layers indicating controlled fire management practices and remains of the extinct Bison antiquus, which could weigh up to 4,400 pounds.

Glenn Stuart said the findings challenge the "outdated idea" that early Indigenous peoples were solely nomadic.

"The evidence of long-term settlement and land stewardship suggests a deep-rooted presence," Stuart said. "It also raises questions about the Bering Strait Theory, supporting oral histories that Indigenous communities have lived here for countless generations."

Researchers compared the historical significance of the site to landmarks such as the Great Pyramid of Giza, Stonehenge and Göbekli Tepe because of what they believe it could reveal about early human civilization.

Dave Rondeau described the moment of discovery by saying, "The moment I saw the layers of history peeking through the soil, I felt the weight of generations staring back at me.”

“Now that the evidence has proven my first instincts, this site is shaking up everything we thought we knew and could change the narrative of early Indigenous civilizations in North America,” he added.

The discovery has also reignited broader cultural debates over history, origins and ancient civilizations. Headlines increasingly frame archaeological discoveries as events that “rewrite human history” or overturn long-held understandings of humanity’s beginnings.

As Christians, we should recognize the growing pattern of narratives aimed at reshaping foundational truths about creation, origins and mankind’s place in the world.

Scripture already tells us deception will increase in the last days. We must remain grounded in the Word of God rather than tossed back and forth by every new theory, trend or sensational claim presented as settled truth. Archaeological discoveries can provide fascinating insight into ancient cultures and civilizations, but they do not override the authority of Scripture.

As the world continues searching for answers about humanity’s beginnings, we must stand firm in biblical truth, equipped with the full armor of God and led by the Holy Spirit to discern truth from deception in an age increasingly hostile to the foundations of the Bible.
